DEATH LIST RISES TO 2,142

Mgr. Chiapetta, Pope's Envoy, Gathers Data in Stricken Region and Praises Work of Relief.

By ARNALDO CORTESI.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BENEVENTO, July 26.—King Victor Emmanuel today spent another ghastly day amid the destruction and grief of two provinces of Southern Italy. Beginning at 6 o'clock this morning, for fourteen hours under a blazing sun he looked on the scenes of death, ruin and bereavement which could not but shock the most hardened heart.

Several times he appeared to be on the point of breaking down under the physical emotion and strain, but each time he recovered and proceeded grimly with his harrowing duty. He also saw much, however, which must have caused his heart to swell with pride—the rescuers' devotion to duty, the enthusiasm with which he was received by the populace and the fortitude with which the hard-smitten inhabitants stood the calamity which had befallen them.

The King began his tour of the damaged region in Melfi, where the scenes were rendered more horrible by the aftermath of an earthquake disaster. Many details of soldiers were struggling valiantly to clear away the wreckage and recover and bury the dead, but the task is of such enormous proportions owing to the number of collapsed houses, that they appeared hardly to make an impression on the huge piles of tumbled masonry.

Cheers Little Girl in Hospital.

After inspecting the town and seeing the extent of the damage, the King visited the Red Cross hospital improvised under tents, where he fondled a little 4-year-old child who had been saved by soldiers after she had been lying for three days under wreckage. Her legs were badly crushed, but she is expected to live. She wept weakly when the King laid a hand on her head and spoke to her in baby talk. In the same hospital the King visited ten men who also were rescued from the ruins today. They are all in a serious condition, but are expected to live.

The King then set out in his motor car and visited other damaged areas. He was followed only by two aides and a few officials. The sovereign wishes to come into contact with the humble folk, which it would be impossible to do if he were surrounded by his usual retinue, and the villagers were not slow in taking advantage of the King's wish. They crowded around him eagerly, telling him their troubles and pointing out the damages of their houses.

The King had a kind word for all and made no secret of how profoundly he was affected by the suffering he saw all around him. The villagers were moved by the King's graciousness, and his obvious concern and grief raised to a high pitch the enthusiasm of his subjects, who cheered him loudly wherever he went.

Desperate digging by rescue parties throughout the damaged region is still bearing fruit, and a few persons have been saved from beneath wreckage after having remained buried for more than three days.

King Congratulates Woman.

Vincenzina Scarano, another 4-year-old girl, was rescued in Lacedonia. Her faint cries for help were heard by a woman who happened to be passing. Soldiers immediately started digging and found her pinned under a wooden beam which had prevented the full weight of the ceiling from falling upon her. She is in a very grave condition. Her three sisters are still under the wreckage and are believed to be dead.

In Rionero the King congratulated a woman who had been saved from a ruined cellar without receiving dangerous injuries. It has been learned that efforts to save a young woman in Aquilonia, which the King watched yesterday, were unsuccessful, because she died soon after being reached by Fascisti after three days of digging. She was named Giuseppina Bachetta, 20 years old.

Words cannot be found eloquent enough to praise the self-sacrificing behavior of all the rescuers. Soldiers who are participating in the rescue work have voluntarily given up their meager pay, wishing it to be dedicated to softening the hardships of the stricken populace.

During the first two days, when shelter was scarce, they slept in the French Win Doubles and Lead Our Team, 2 to 1, for Davis Cup

France took the lead over the United States, two matches to one, in the Davis Cup challenge round at Auteuil yesterday when Henri Cochet and Jacques Brugnon defeated Wilmer Allison and John Van Ryn, 6–3, 7–5, 1–6, 6–2. President Doumergue and members of the French Cabinet were among the 10,000 witnessing the surprising victory. Two singles matches will complete the play today.

Tommy Armour, Detroit pro, carded a 64, six under par, and tied with Leo Diegel with a 72-hole total of 277 for the Canadian open golf championship at Ancaster, Ont.

The Giants defeated the Pirates, 10 to 4. The league leading Robins beat the Reds, 8 to 5, while the Cubs downed the Phillies, 16 to 2, Wilson getting three home runs. The Yankees lost to the Tigers, 12 to 8.

EINSTEIN EVOLVING YET ANOTHER THEORY

French Woman Savant Devotes Every Odd Moment at Geneva to Scientific Treatise.

By CLARENCE K. STREIT.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, July 26.—Calculating, jotting down figures and symbols, checking equations, smoking his pipe when he has not forgotten to light it, figuring while the translators are turning into French and English his views on the necessity for improving the education of children, Professor Albert Einstein, even during the sessions here of the League of Nations Committee on Intellectual Cooperation, of which he is one of the illustrious members, is working in a field of study still more vast than those in which he has already pioneered.

He does not say what it is, but when asked if the subject was more interesting than his previous theories he replied, with the soft voice and engaging smile which from merely looking at him one expects him to have, "I think it is more interesting. But maybe people will think I am a fool when they read it."

Mme. Curie Silent on Studies.

At the other end of the committee table sits slight, black-robed, white-haired Mme. Curie. With bright eyes peering from behind horn-rimmed glasses, she follows closely the discussion on the reorganization of the intellectual cooperation section, but she rarely joins in it. When the meeting adjourns for lunch or dinner she is to be seen refusing all the social invitations pressed on her. She has not time, she explains, for she needs every spare moment to finish the scientific monograph which she must deliver in Paris soon. To the question, "What is its subject?" she does not answer.

Mme. Curie will not allow herself to be either interviewed or photographed. She does not know yet that the man who passed her when she was reaching at noon today for her black, purple-lined cape, hanging in the hall of the Secretariat, and who stopped to help her into it, was Derso, the Hungarian caricaturist, who had just sketched her.

When Mme. Curie has any free time she is usually to be seen deep in conversation with her old friend, Dr. Einstein. The sight of the frail, earnest little woman who, with her husband, discovered radium, and the stocky man with leonine hair and the gentlest of expressions who is the genius who propounded the relativity theory, sitting on a bench in the lobby Secretariat lost to everything but their conversation, is one

AMTORG ACCUSED IN SMUGGLING PLOT; SECRET LIST SEIZED

Two Arrested for Bringing In Watches Name Leader as Official of Agency.

TUTTLE ACTS ON EVIDENCE

Finds Hint of Passport Frauds and Sees Chance to End Band—Amtorg Makes Denial.

DETROIT RED LINKED HERE

Witness at Congressional Inquiry Declares New York Leads in Communist Numbers.

Troubles continued to pile up yesterday on the Amtorg Trading Corporation, the Soviet commercial agency in this country. While the Treasury Department in Washington was enforcing its embargo on the importation of Soviet pulpwood and holding out the possibility of an embargo on other Russian products, in compliance with protests of American producers against Soviet dumping, notably that of anthracite and manganese ore, Federal authorities here unearthed evidence of smuggling by an alleged employe of the Amtorg as well as evidence of subversive Soviet activity.

This evidence was discovered in connection with the arrest of two men accused of smuggling 640 watch movements into this country and who, when taken to the Federal Building, declared that the contraband was the property of the Amtorg. United States Attorney Tuttle described the evidence as "the most significant find yet made regarding secret Soviet activities in this country."

Book Names Soviet Agents.

The find consisted of a little, leather-bound black book containing the names and addresses of twenty-five Soviet agents operating in the United States and of Soviet agents in China and Japan, and what Mr. Tuttle described as baptismal blanks for forging birth certificates for American passports used by Soviet agents in going back and forth between Europe and America. The baptismal blanks were in the name of St. George's Episcopal Church at Marcy and Gates Avenues, Brooklyn.

The evidence was turned over by Mr. Tuttle until tomorrow to the New York police to be photostated and checked up with lists of Communist agents at Police Headquarters. Neither Mr. Tuttle nor the police would make public the newly discovered roster of names, it being their intention to seize as many of the alleged Soviet agents as possible.

The discovery of the list, Mr. Tuttle hopes, may enable the authorities to break up a band of Soviet agents who have been known to operate between Moscow and the United States.

In addition to the little black book and the baptismal certificate blanks a credential badge was found on one of the men arrested reading as follows:

"The bearer of this badge is a trustworthy servant of the Soviet and can be entrusted with any secrets. Secretariat."

Those familiar with Communist methods were puzzled at the fact that such a credential badge should be found on the person of any one associated with Communist propaganda. It was considered unlikely that any man acting as an agent for a Communist organization would carry his credentials on his person. The signature "secretariat" also appeared mysterious. The question was asked, "Secretariat of what?" There was nothing else on the alleged credential to indicate the particular organization that may have issued it.

The men arrested for smuggling the watch movements are Jacob

National City Bank Fugitive in Spanish Army; Ready for Trial on $1,000,000 Paris Charges

By P. J. PHILIP.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 26.—Under the name Alexander Avial, Laureano Carlos Villanueva, former Commercial Attaché at the Venezuelan Consulate here and an officer of the Paris branch of the National City Bank of New York, was found serving as a private in the Spanish Foreign Legion. For the past two weeks the French police have been trying to locate the handsome young Venezuelan, who was socially prominent in Paris and a well-known polo player, to answer to charges of having misappropriated sums said to amount to nearly $1,000,000 which had been confided to him in his capacity as an officer of the National City Bank.

It was at first believed he had committed suicide, as he had left letters which indicated such an intention. To one of his friends, however, he communicated his whereabouts, and this friend visited him in Morocco, where he had enlisted in the Spanish Legion. The friend brought back with him a letter from Señor Villanueva to Magistrate Ordonneau, which was presented today by Señor Villanueva's lawyer.

In his letter Señor Villanueva declared that he had enlisted in the Spanish Foreign Legion, not knowing what else to do, but that he was prepared, as soon as he could be relieved of his military obligation, to surrender to the French authorities and to stand trial. It is understood steps are being taken by his relatives to obtain his release from his enlistment.

Today a Caracas firm of merchants filed a further complaint against him of misappropriation of $130,000 which had been entrusted to him two years ago.

Thomas F. Woodlock to Resign From I. C. C.; Expected to Join The Wall Street Journal

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Thomas F. Woodlock of New York, who has been a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission since 1925, is understood to plan resigning early next month, although official confirmation of his retirement is lacking. He will be 64 years old on Sept. 1.

In the absence from the city of President Hoover and his official associates at the White House and of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, no authoritative information could be obtained today regarding the pending resignation. It was said, however, that President Hoover had not definitely selected a successor.

It was currently reported in financial circles yesterday that Commissioner Woodlock, on retiring from office, would join the managing staff of The Wall Street Journal, specializing on discussions of railway matters and possibly traveling about the country to investigate new phases of the railway situation.

It was through his editorial writings on the subject in The Wall Street Journal prior to the war, also in the old Commercial Advertiser and afterward in The Evening Sun, that Mr. Woodlock became known to financial readers. His previous career as a working journalist in New York had occupied more than twenty years, with financial and railway questions always a specialty.

Mr. Woodlock was born in Ireland, educated in England and was a newspaper man and stock broker in London before coming to the United States in 1892. He was for a time floor partner of a stock brokerage firm here.

President Coolidge appointed him a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission on Jan. 26, 1925, but the Senate twice failed to confirm him. The President gave him a recess appointment in March, 1925, and on March 26, 1926, the Senate confirmed his nomination, 52 to 25.

MONROE'S OAK HILL BOUGHT BY MELLON

Historic Estate at Aldie, Va., Is Gift of Secretary to His Daughter, Mrs. Bruce.

HOUSE ERECTED IN 1821

Jefferson Had Hand in Design—Property Bought From Frank C. Littleton for $700,000.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Oak Hill, the historic estate of James Monroe, the fifth President, at Aldie, Va., has been purchased by Secretary Mellon for his daughter, Mrs. David K. Estes Bruce, whose husband is the son of former Senator Bruce of Maryland. The price paid for the stately Georgian mansion of brick and its surrounding 2,000 acres is said to have been $700,000.

Mrs. Bruce is understood not to have been in good health for some time and to be desirous of life in the beneficial climate which Oak Hill enjoys, close to the Blue Ridge Mountains.

The property was purchased from Frank C. Littleton, a native of Loudoun County, Va., in which the estate is located. Mr. Littleton, a retired New York business man, bought it in 1919.

With the exception of Mount Vernon, Oak Hill is the nearest to Washington of any of the homes of the Presidents, as well as being one of the most beautiful of Virginia estates. It is thirty-five miles from the capital, eighteen miles from Fairfax Court House on the road to Middleburg and Winchester, Va., and nine miles from Leesburg, where Monroe, as Secretary of State, fled with the records of the State Department when the British occupied Washington in 1814.

Extensive View From Estate.

The estate takes its name from a grove of oak trees on a slight hill, whence are visible to the north the town of Leesburg and to the south the Three Cobblers, foothills of the Blue Ridge, and a spur of the Bull Run Mountains, beyond which lies the battlefield of Bull Run.

The surrounding countryside is rolling, while the estate is washed by a small stream named by the Indians Gohongarestan, meaning "river of swans," but now known by the more prosaic name of Goose Creek.

Historic interest attaches to the property, not only from the noted men who have occupied it and been guests there, but from the fact that Thomas Jefferson designed it, at least in part, and that aiding in the construction was James Hoban, the Irishman who was architect of the White House and one of the architects of the Capitol.

A brick structure of three stories, with simple lines, the building reminds one much of the State Capitol at Richmond, which Jefferson also designed. A significant Jeffersonian touch is seen in the seven Doric columns of the south portico, each thirty feet high and nine feet in circumference. Below the portico stands a terraced garden which has been carefully restored.

Still standing are the 200-year-old cottage which Monroe occupied when the building was being erected and the old brick smokehouse in use to this day.

Dinosaur Tracks in Flagstones.

Scientific interest is added from the fact that in the flagstones of the porch floors are the tracks of dinosaurs. These stones were quarried on the place and the discovery of the dinosaurs' tracks resulted in throwing back the geological age of the region several million years.

At either end of the two drawing-rooms stand fireplaces surmounted by white marble mantels, imported from France as the gift of Lafayette on his visit to the United States during the Administration of President Monroe.

The rooms are large, with the ceilings high, and, suspended from them, massive chandeliers of crystal. The

DR. W. H. ALLEN FACES STOCK DEAL INQUIRY

Grand Jury Sifts Activities of Public Service Institute Head in Gold Mine Promotion.

SHARE BUYER COMPLAINS

Critic of City Administration Defends Course and Lays Case to Hostility of Walker.

Dr. William H. Allen, director of the Municipal Economy Committee and the Institute of Public Service at 53 Chambers Street, and his brother, Wilbur F. Allen, are under investigation by the grand jury in connection with their activities in the sale of a stock in a Mexican gold mine, it was learned yesterday.

The investigation is being conducted before the grand jurors by Assistant District Attorney John J. McNaboe on the complaint of the Better Business Bureau, which has an office on the same floor with Dr. Allen. The bureau is acting for Miss Grace L. Cotterill, whose address is given as the Green Ridge Inn at White Plains, N. Y.

Woman Tells of $2,000 Loss.

Miss Cotterill charges, according to the prosecutor, that on Nov. 7, 1928, she gave $2,000, her life savings, for 6,000 shares of La Palma Mining Company stock, a company Dr. Allen and his brother admit is non-existent, but got instead 240 shares of La Verdina Mining Company stock. She added that since then she has not received a cent in dividends or any intimation that her original investment would be returned to her.

Miss Cotterill, who is employed by a professional man at 601 West 115th Street, Mr. McNaboe said, and William Collis, an investigator for the Better Business Bureau, were witnesses before the grand jury last Friday, when the investigation began. Two other witnesses are to be questioned tomorrow. It is understood that the grand jurors will report their findings to Judge Rosalsky in General Sessions on Tuesday.

Mr. McNaboe said that in his preliminary investigation he was informed that letters were sent in envelopes of the Institute of Public Service to some of those who had purchased stock in the gold mining venture since Dr. Allen and his brother became identified with it about a year and a half ago. These letters, it was said, gave encouraging reports of the progress of the working of the La Verdina mine, which is thirty-two miles northeast of Carbo, Sonora, Mexico.

Many of these communications were signed "W. H. A.," Dr. Allen's initials, the prosecutor said. In one of them the expression "We shall have the world by the tail" was used.

Sees Hand of Mayor in Plight.

Dr. Allen, whose repeated unsupported charges of grafting in the city administration has led on two occasions to his being barred by Mayor Walker from Board of Estimate meetings, issued a statement yesterday afternoon in which he hinted that Mayor Walker might have had something to do with his not having been called as a witness before the grand jury in the gold mine investigation.

"I have been asking for the truth about public affairs too long to cry when I am the intended victim," Dr. Allen said. "If the grand jury ever calls me I believe it will turn out as the other grand juries did, where my facts were confirmed and the Mayor proved to have used his official power against the public welfare in an effort to injure a citizen.

"This time the jury will ask less patiently than I do what the District Attorney ever meant by taking their time and subjecting a citizen to such attack, when in five minutes he could have learned that such use of his power would be brutally un-American.

MERCURY AT 87 HERE AS HEAT AND DROUGHT PARCH THE MID-WEST

Thunder Showers Forecast for Today, but Hot Wave Is Expected to Continue.

CROWDS SLEEP ON BEACHES

400,000 Go to Coney Island and 350,000 to the Rockaways to Seek Relief.

107 DEGREES IN ILLINOIS

Five Die in Chicago and Three in Milwaukee—Baltimore Toll for Week Is Seventeen.

While the return of the heat wave to New York City was tempered by low humidity and cooling breezes yesterday, the second wave of extreme heat in the Middle West caused death and suffering. Continued droughts over a wide area caused further damage to crops. The Northwest found relief in showers.

The maximum temperature in New York was 87 at 3 and 4 P. M., when the humidity was 44 and 35. At 10 P. M. the temperature had dropped 12 degrees to 75, but the humidity registered 84.

The hot weather here sent 400,000 to Coney Island and 350,000 to beaches in the Rockaways. Atlantic City and other New Jersey shore resorts reported unusually large crowds.

The forecast for New York City and vicinity for today was, "probably thunder showers, not much change in temperature, moderate southwest winds."

With practically every section of the country suffering from the heat in varying degrees, ice cakes weighing from 50 to 300 pounds were scooped from the Mississippi River by clam-shell buckets excavating between a coffer dam and lock walls and striking an ice strata, according to The Associated Press.

105 Degrees at Carbondale, Ill.

From Chicago came reports that the heat wave had sent the mercury above the 100 mark in the wide section between the Kansas Plains and the Great Lakes. In Southern Illinois, suffering from a prolonged drought, Carbondale reported the highest temperature, 105, reading from a government thermometer. Topeka, Kan., reported 103 and Lincoln, Neb., 101. In Newton Mo., it was 100. In Little Rock, Ark., the temperature reached 101, and in Conway, Ark., there was a maximum of 110, according to The Associated Press. Yesterday was the sixty-fourth day of drought in Arkansas. The temperature was 98 in Wichita, Kan., and St. Louis, Mo.

Chicago reported five deaths from the heat. In Ohio one death was attributed to the heat wave. Milwaukee reported three deaths, and Baltimore one death from the heat yesterday and seventeen for the week. One death was reported in Youngstown, Ohio.

A high wind with a terrific hail storm, inflicted thousands of dollars damage to crops in the vicinity of Vinton, Iowa. The hail cut the corn to ribbons.

Pealing church bells summoned farmers to pray for rain in rural communities of Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota, where the crops are parched by drought and a blistering sun.

Ignoring the mercury at 100 degrees, the City Council of Valparaiso, Ind., met to pass an ordinance requiring citizens to shovel

J. N. Jarvie Left $15,000,000 to Aid Aged Poor; Montclair Capitalist's Estate $37,573,905

James Newbegin Jarvie, capitalist and philanthropist, of Upper Montclair, N. J., left an estate valued at $37,573,905, it was revealed yesterday when M. L. Berry, vice ordinary, in Prerogative Court in Newark, approved the accounting of the executors and allowed fees of $700,000 to the executors and their counsel.

Mr. Jarvie's will, filed a year ago in Prerogative Court in Trenton, provided for legacies and trust funds totaling almost $9,000,000, including bequests of $3,250,000 to the Presbyterian Church in the United States.

Mr. Jarvie, who made his fortune in coffee and sugar enterprises and was a director of the Bank of America, National Associations, the Cuba Cane Sugar Corporation and the Southern Pacific Company, died suddenly on June 21, 1929, while on the Homeric on the way to his native England for a vacation.

The accounting showed a balance of $19,517,232 principal and $530,625 income on hand, after payment of all debts and distribution of legacies. Mr. Jarvie's will provided that after payment of the legacies and the setting up of trust funds amounting to $5,125,000, the residuary estate should go to the Jarvie Commonwealth Fund, a New York State corporation for the benefit of the aged poor.

James Turner of Montclair and Henry Elwyn Worcester of Winchester, Mass., nephews of Mr. Jarvie, and the Central Hanover Trust Company of New York were appointed executors as well as trustees of the funds established in the will. To each was awarded $150,000 by the court. To the firm of Lindabury, Depue & Faulks of Newark, counsel for the executors, was awarded $250,000. The will set $150,000 as the limit for fees to be received by any executor or trustee apart from legal commissions for receiving and paying out income of the trusts.

Mr. Jarvie's bequest to the Presbyterian Church in the United States included $3,000,000 outright to the Board of National Missions of the church for its permanent fund and $250,000 to the Board of Foreign Missions. The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor received $50,000, and a trust fund of $100,000 was to be set up for the maintenance of the Young Men's Christian Association Building at Jerusalem in Palestine.

Another trust fund of $5,000,000 was for the life use, equally, of a group of ten relatives, to be distributed outright to their descendants. Other relatives and employes received legacies.

All inheritance taxes, Mr. Jarvie provided, were to be paid from the residuary estate. Another provision voided any bequest to a legatee who might contest the will.

Hoover Visit to Mexico City Is Considered for Fall

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—President Hoover is understood to be still hopeful of finding it possible to pay a visit to Mexico City before the return of Ambassador Morrow to take up his duties in the Senate.

The President is reported to have promised Ambassador Morrow that he would try to arrange a visit before the Ambassador departed late in September or early in October.

At the Mexican Embassy it was stated that the Mexican Government has not been informed that any definite visit was under contemplation. Señor Ortiz Rubio, upon his visit to the United States as President-elect, extended an invitation to President Hoover to visit the Mexican capital, and Ambassador Tellez is understood to have discussed the matter with the President subsequently.

'MA' FERGUSON LEADS IN PRIMARY IN TEXAS

Ex-Governor, Fighting for a 'Come-Back,' Overcomes Early Margin for Sterling.

1928 CAMPAIGNERS TRAIL

Love Runs Behind Young in Field of Eleven Democrats in Governorship Race.

By The Associated Press.

DALLAS, Texas, July 26.—Mrs. Miriam A. (Ma) Ferguson, former Governor, whose husband, James E. Ferguson, was impeached while Governor, took the lead late tonight in the field of eleven candidates for the Democratic nomination for Governor as unofficial returns from 190 of the 253 counties of the State had been received from today's primary election.

In her fight for a "come-back," she overcame the early margin held by Ross S. Sterling of Houston, chairman of the State Highway Commission, whose advocacy of a $300,000,000 bond plan for State roads was the main issue in the campaign. Mr. Sterling, still running second, was more than 10,000 votes behind Mrs. Ferguson, whose strength in the rural sections offset his heavy vote in Houston and San Antonio.

Senator Thomas B. Love, former Democratic National Committeeman, who sought to focus the entire fight on a test of his support of Herbert Hoover in the last Presidential election when Texas went Republican, was trailing James Young, who, as Democratic State Chairman, led the battle for Alfred E. Smith in 1928, and both of them were running behind State Senator Clint C. Small. The rest of the "big seven" in the campaign were Earle B. Mayfield, former United States Senator, and Lieut. Governor Barry Miller.

Four others, Frank Putnam, Paul Loven, C. C. Moody and Dr. C. E. Walker, did not make active campaigns.

Standing of the Candidates.

When returns had been compiled by the Texas Election Bureau from 174 counties, including four complete, the vote for Governor stood: Mrs. Ferguson, 44,779; Sterling, 37,517; Small, 30,040; Young, 16,442; Love, 16,111; Mayfield, 11,966; Miller, 9,983; Moody, 846; Putnam, 678; Loven, 616; Walker, 459.

The unofficial count from the 190 counties, with five complete, gave Mrs. Ferguson 53,898 and Sterling 42,267.

Ideal Summer weather brought out a tremendous vote, estimates from reliable quarters placing the total at far more than the 737,901 votes cast two years ago. The polls close at 7 P. M. Total registration was 1,283,-

SELECTION OF FESS TAKEN TO FORECAST HOOVER '32 POLICIES

New Chairman Opposes Dry Repeal and Radical Farm Relief and Backs Tariff.

WILL HELP MOLD PROGRAM

Choice Considered by Some the President's Reply to Morrow and the Eastern Wets.

INSURGENTS ARE INDIGNANT

They Assert Party Is Getting More Conservative and the President With It.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Selection by President Hoover of Senator Simeon D. Fess of Ohio to succeed Claudius H. Huston as chairman of the Republican National Committee means, in the opinion of many party leaders here, that there will be no change in the President's policy on prohibition, farm relief and the tariff.

The selection of Senator Fess also is interpreted as meaning that the Republican national organization will continue to be conservative and there will be no concessions to members of the farm bloc, who for years have been urging an equalization fee or some other form of subsidy to the farmer.

Senator Fess stands for the Eighteenth Amendment. His views on the subject of prohibition, it is said, were investigated thoroughly before the President finally decided upon him as Mr. Huston's successor.

His selection is regarded here as indicating that the President intends to stand with the drys in support of what he described during his campaign for election as a "noble experiment," and is accepted in some quarters as the President's answer to the demand for repeal of the amendment, which has gained strength during the last few months in some Eastern States, particularly in New Jersey, where Ambassador Morrow won the nomination for United States Senator as an advocate of repeal.

Except for his position on prohibition Senator Fess, as a decided conservative, is expected to be satisfactory to Eastern Republicans. It was said that he would not enter his duties as head of the national party organization with the approval of the Republicans of the agricultural States of the Middle West, where the farmers of the wheat belt in particular are reported dissatisfied with the operation of the farm relief act.

Senator Fess is far too conservative for the insurgent Republican bloc in Congress, many of whom voted against the tariff bill, which Senator Fess supported.

In the opinion of members of the insurgent group, the Republican party is becoming more and more conservative and some of the insurgent Senators and Representatives have expressed the belief that the President by his selection of Senator Fess had classed himself with the conservatives.

Some Western Republican Senators are reported to be as much opposed to Senator Fess as chairman of the National Committee as they are to Senator Moses of New Hampshire as chairman of the Senatorial Campaign Committee. In criticizing the selection of Senator Fess the insurgents point to his record on farm relief and tariff legislation as placing him definitely in the inner circles of the conservatives.

Fess's Utterances Recalled.

Senator Fess's speech as temporary chairman of the National Convention at Kansas City in 1928, at which Mr. Hoover was nominated for President, was recalled by his critics as evidence of his "stand patism."

In discussing farm relief in that speech, Senator Fess not only spoke against the equalization fee, but added:

"All relief measures, to be of permanent value, must be constructive and grounded in economic principles underlying production and consumption. The solution is primarily economic and not political. It is more individual and collective than governmental."

In his Kansas City speech Senator Fess also strongly upheld prohibition, saying:

"No backward step can be tolerated upon whatever pretext which would permit a noisy minority to exploit the great mass of our population. The Republican party is ready to call the roll on this false doctrine masquerading under the mask of liberty. It is ready to sound the moral tocsin against the present campaign of a noise-making minority, whether in the interest of business profit or mere human indulgence."

The belief among some leading Republicans here is that Senator Fess will remain as chairman only for a comparatively short time and that he will be succeeded early in 1931 by Postmaster General Walter F. Brown, also of Ohio, who will direct President Hoover's campaign for renomination. Mr. Brown is regarded by many as the chief political adviser of the administration.

In creating the salaried post of chairman of the executive committee of the national committee for Robert F. Lucas of Kentucky the Republicans will not follow exactly the precedent created by the Democrats in electing Jouett Shouse as executive committee chairman to direct the Democratic national organization between national campaigns.

Mr. Lucas's duties will correspond in general to those of Mr. Shouse, but it was pointed out today by Democratic leaders that Mr. Shouse is serving without salary.

Fess Predicts Hoover's Renomination.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., July 26 (AP).—Senator Simeon D. Fess of Ohio, in an interview here today, predicted that Herbert Hoover again will be nominated by the Republican party for President in 1932. Mr. Fess also declared Hoover would overwhelm all opposition as he did in 1928. The Senator said that he looked for the nomination of Governor Roosevelt of New York by the Democrats to oppose Hoover.

Senator Fess said that, although prohibition would figure in this Fall's elections as well as in 1932, it would do so only in "local" way.

He said he was optimistic of Republican prospects and that "Democratic propaganda which has been spread to hurt Hoover, will be swept away by the records of the administration's achievements."

MELLON BACKS HOOVER ON BUDGET STATEMENT

Secretary Says Byrns Confuses Matter of Appropriations With Actual Expenditures.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Criticism of President Hoover's recent statement on the budget for the fiscal year beginning July 1, which was made by Representative Joseph W. Byrns of Tennessee, drew a reply from Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, who said that this year's budget represents an increase of only 5 per cent over the actual expenditures of the last fiscal year.

Representative Byrns, who had termed the White House statement "another exhibition of juggling with figures," stated that the projected expenditures were considerably more than an excess of about $209,000,000 estimated by the White House. Secretary Mellon's reply follows:

"The statement of Congressman Byrns in the morning press confuses the matter of appropriations with actual expenditures and leaves an erroneous impression. As a matter of fact, the figures presented by the President to the press were furnished by the Budget Bureau and are the July 1 working figures of the Treasury Department:

"As previously stated, including the estimated postal deficit, the total budget estimates of expenditures for the present fiscal year are $4,203,254,457, as compared with actual expenditures for the last fiscal year of $3,994,152,487, or an increase of $209,101,970, being an increase of 5 per cent. Naturally, these figures do not include amounts appropriated for future years which will not be expended during the present fiscal year."

UNITED YESHIVA CHEST WILL SEEK $500,000

Drive Begins Next Sunday to Raise Fund to Meet Deficit of Nine Parochial Schools.

The United Yeshiva Chest Campaign for $500,000 to cover the combined deficit of nine Yeshivas (Jewish parochial schools) in Manhattan, the Bronx and Brooklyn will be launched next Sunday. This announcement was made yesterday by Judge Max S. Levine of the Court of General Sessions, who is president of the organization.

Tisha B'Ab, the ninth day of the Hebrew month of Ab, next Sunday, which is observed by Jews throughout the world as a national day of mourning in commemoration of the destruction of the temple by Titus 1,860 years ago, was selected for the launching of the drive, because on that day thousands of Jews visit the cemeteries to pay respect to the memory of the dead. This is in accord with ancient Hebraic custom.

It is the plan of the United Yeshiva Chest, with the consent of the New York City Department of Welfare and the consent of the various cemetery owners and associations, to place iron chests at the entrances and exits as well as at other strategic points of the thirty-five Jewish cemeteries in New York and vicinity. These chests will be to receive contributions toward the fund.

HOOVER, AT CAMP, SURVEYS PROBLEMS

In Cool Rapidan Retreat He Studies List for Tariff Board and Program for Capital.

RELIEVED OF LONG TENSION

With Senate Adjourned and Huston Issue Settled, President Turns to Vacation Plans.

From a Staff Correspondent of The New York Times.

LURAY, Va., July 26.—Two matters which President Hoover must settle in the near future were taken up by the Executive at his Rapidan camp today. With Lawrence Richey, one of his secretaries, he is said to have gone over details of the vacation trip he proposes to make to the national parks of the West about Aug. 15 and it is also said that he gave some study to a list of possibilities for the Tariff Commission.

Arrangements for the Western trip have been worked out, but the President has been so busy with other matters that he has refused to consider them until now. The first opportunity came today for Mr. Hoover to see the program and to advise on any changes he prefers.

It is understood that the intinerary and date of departure may be announced Tuesday and that the trip will include a week in Glacier National Park and four or five days in Yellowstone National Park, as previously planned.

Executive Sought for Tariff Board.

Great care is being exercised by the President in choosing the membership of the Tariff Commission, six in all, who must be appointed by Sept. 17. Special emphasis is laid on the selection of a chairman, the desire being to find an executive with broad business experience, but not necessarily at the same time an economic expert.

In the past various chairmen of the Tariff Commission have been economic students, but it is now said that Mr. Hoover does not demand this as a qualification and holds, on the other hand, that executive ability is the most compelling factor.

In addition to these subjects the President spent considerable time in conferring with officials of the District of Columbia upon matters regarding the Federal Territory. For many years, long before he became President, Mr. Hoover has entertained the idea that Washington must eventually become a model of beauty and efficiency among cities, and he is working steadily toward this ideal.

Legislation for the Capital.

In order to discuss what aid he will recommend to Congress next Winter for the district Mr. Hoover included among his seventeen week-end guests the three District Commissioners, Dr. Luther Reichelderfer, Brig. Gen. Herbert B. Crosby and Major John C. Gotwals, and also Lieut. Col. U. S. Grant 3d, in charge of public buildings and grounds.

Their discussion with the President, besides the District budget for 1931, included the question of law enforcement, with especial stress upon prohibition.

President and Mrs. Hoover and their guests at the camp found it hot in the sunshine when they woke today, but they also discovered that it was gratefully cool in the shade and that the mountain air was utterly free from the humidity which so often oppresses Washington.

Difficult as it may be to realize, last night was so delightful that the visitors actually slept under light blankets until the morning sun came creeping into their cabins. This, however, is not unusual, even on the warmest Summer nights, the camp enjoying an elevation of 2,500 feet above sea level.

This afternoon the President and some of his friends indulged in a horseshoe pitching contest under the shadow of a large oak tree. Later he and nearly every one else retired to their cabins for a relaxing nap.

His companions found Mr. Hoover in a particularly carefree and happy mood today. The Senate has adjourned, the Huston issue has been settled, and the Executive is looking forward to his Western vacation.

'MA' FERGUSON LEADS IN PRIMARY IN TEXAS

897 and the voters balloted on candidates ranging from constable to United States Senator.

Morris Sheppard, Democrat, author of the Eighteenth Amendment, was opposed by two others for the nomination for United States Senator, but his selection was accepted as inevitable.

The vote for United States Senator on the Democratic ticket was: Sheppard 11,433, Robert L. Henry 4,661, C. A. Mitchner 699.

The large number of entrants in the Governorship race made it seem certain that a run-off primary would be necessary. A run-off will be held in each race in which no candidate receives a majority, the two highest being participants.

Sterling's Road Plan the Big Issue.

A big State issue is involved on the proposed $300,000,000 road bond plan with which Mr. Sterling, chairman of the State Highway Commission and owner of the Houston Post-Dispatch, has proposed to complete the Texas road system.

Mr. Sterling's opponents for the Governorship nomination have attacked his plan as both unnecessary and an injustice to the schools. Under Texas laws schools receive one-fourth of the gasoline tax, the remainder financing the Highway Commission.

Mr. Miller, who defeated Senator Love for Lieutenant Governor two years ago, has taken a "liberal" stand regarding prohibition, which he calls a failure in Texas.

Voting was reported light in the Republican primary. The Republicans held their second primary in the State's history as a result of the party's candidate for Governor polling more than 100,000 votes in 1928. Four candidates contested for the Republican Gubernatorial nomination, and the Republicans also had complete State and national tickets in the field.

In the Congressional contests, sixteen Democrats and Texas's Lone Republican representative sought renomination. Nine of the Democrats had opposition, as did the Republican. There was a three-cornered fight for the Democratic nomination for the other place, that of the retiring Claude Hudspeth of the El Paso District.

Conflict of 1928 Renewed.

The Republicans, however, were passive in their campaign, making no public speeches, and the State's interest centred on the Democratic Governorship race.

With his name on the ballot by virtue of a Supreme Court order, Senator Love was the self-acclaimed only "anti-Tammany" candidate in the Democratic field. He asked the people to follow up their voting in the 1928 Presidential campaign by nominating him. He led in the 1928 fight to carry the State against former Governor Alfred E. Smith of New York.

Pro-Smith sentiment, however, was divided between the other candidates, and observers were discounting the outcome as a barometer on the State's attitude toward national politics.

Jim Young of Kaufman, former member of Congress and leader of the regular Democrats in the Smith-Hoover controversy, was one of Senator Love's opponents, as was Mrs. Ferguson, defeated for re-election four years ago by Dan Moody.

In mid-campaign, however, the rival candidates concentrated their fire in argument over the road bond plan advocated by Mr. Sterling, apparently ignoring, in the opinion of observers, the bolt for Herbert Hoover, led by Senator Love two years ago.

Due to the size of the field, the candidates predicted that a majority vote for one seemed impossible, and thus a run-off primary Aug. 23 seemed inevitable.

Asserting that Mrs. Ferguson was a proxy candidate for her husband, former Governor James E. Ferguson, who was barred by a Supreme Court ruling from becoming a candidate after his impeachment, some of the other candidates conceded that Mrs. Ferguson would be one of the run-off primary opponents.

Borah to Rest Month in Maine Under Orders of His Doctors

By The Associated Press.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Under doctors' orders to take a two months' rest, Senator Borah will leave here early next week to spend at least a month in Maine. He said that he had not chosen the site for his rest, but that it would be near the Canadian border.

The Idaho Senator, who has been undergoing examinations at Johns Hopkins Hospital in Baltimore, received a final report from his physicians today showing that while no organic trouble existed he was in a weakened condition.

Mr. Borah, who has not been absent from Washington more than a day or two since the Hoover Administration began, is anxious to get back to Idaho to conduct his campaign for re-election and to speak in the West on farm relief.

NORRIS IN DRY PLEA OPENS CAMPAIGN

Senator, Seeking Re-election, Demands Fair Trial by Enforcement in "Good Faith."

HITS "PROFIT IN VIOLATION"

On Arrival at Lincoln He Scores "Trick" Played on Him in Plan to Run "Norris No. 2."

Special to The New York Times.

LINCOLN, Neb., July 26.—Senator Norris came out of the East tonight and fired the first gun of his Senatorial campaign.

Before a crowd estimated at 6,000 gathered for the opening session of the Nebraska Epworth League Assembly, a Methodist Church organization, he asserted his confidence in prohibition and advanced his theories for the improvement of its enforcement.

"I am one who believes that when you take into consideration all the circumstances, national prohibition has been and still is a success," he said. "But I frankly admit that there still are many disappointments connected with the prohibition law."

Hardly had the wheels of the train bearing him back home stopped rolling before Mr. Norris relieved pent-up emotions on the subject of the filing of nomination papers against him by Grocer George W. Norris of Broken Bow, which forced him to take the defensive until a State Supreme Court decision eliminated the name of Norris No. 2 on the Republican primary ballot.

"The filing of the Broken Bow man was the dirtiest, meanest and most disreputable trick that was ever pulled off," he asserted.

Senator Norris is still opposed in the primaries by State Treasurer Stebbins, a "regular."

Senator Norris deserted the Republican party in 1928 for Governor Smith because of the latter's views on power and conservation questions.

In his opening speech he said he was opposed to repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment, declaring that "prohibition has not had a fair and honest trial." He urged more consistent enforcement and asserted that the law would be a success "if enforced in good faith."

Sees Disregard of Law.

The Senator attributed any failure of prohibition enforcement, in part, at least, to "the modern tendency" for disregard of the law, a condition which, he said, was due to "the trickery, robbery and debauchery of public officials."

"The reason is quite evident, for there is more profit in violating the prohibition law than any other," he continued. "If we could eliminate the financial profit which comes from violation of the prohibition law we would have taken the greatest step possible in its proper enforcement."

Another evil, he said, was the politics involved in enforcement.

"Prohibition enforcement has been and still is honeycombed with partisan politics," he declared.

Detailing incidents which had occurred during his career as Senator in which political considerations had played an important rôle in the selection of enforcement officials, he quoted at length from testimony given by Chester P. Mills, former prohibition agent in New York, as to the effect of politics in the Andrews régime and its bearing on the failure of enforcement in New York.

Calls Farm Board Powerless.

OMAHA, July 26 (AP).—Senator Norris, arriving in his home State today to begin his campaign, stated that the Federal Farm Board "hasn't done anything for the farmer and can't."

He contended that the board was attempting the impossible in handling crop surpluses as it is trying to do.

"It is not necessary to tell the farmers of Nebraska that the Farm Board has failed to help them," he said. "They know that by prices of their wheat and other crops."

ROBINSON OPENS CAMPAIGN.

Arkansan Backs Dry Law and Attacks Ku Klux Leader.

BISON, Ark., July 26 (AP).—Opening his campaign for renomination, Senator Robinson here today reviewed his record in Congress, declared he now is and always has been a stanch supporter of national prohibition and assailed the activity against him of J. A. Comer, Arkansas Grand Dragon of the Ku Klux Klan.

Although the primary is only a little more than two weeks off and his opponent, Tom W. Campbell of Little Rock, has been stumping the State for weeks, Senator Robinson explained that his duties in Washington had kept him from opening his campaign before.

He denounced as absolutely false the charges made by his opponent that he was aligned with the so-called "power trust," that he had ever been unfriendly to organized labor or against "any measure for farm relief," or that he ever had been in favor of the repeal or modification of the Volstead act or of the Eighteenth Amendment.

"National prohibition is well established in our nation and I do not believe we should make any change except to provide for its better enforcement," he said.

GRAIN CORPORATION IN BIG WORLD TRADE

1,000,000-Bushel Shipments of Wheat in Week Made on Completing of Organization.

BUYS NORTHWEST AGENCY

Huff, on Anniversary of Federal Concern, Predicts It Will Handle Half of 1931 Crop.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Assertion that the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, on the first anniversary of its establishment, had become the greatest single factor in the world wheat trade and would next year handle probably half the wheat grown in the United States, was made here today by C. E. Huff, president of the corporation.

Mr. Huff arrived in Washington for a conference with Alexander Legge, chairman of the Farm Board, which organized the grain corporation as a cooperative clearing house, where farmers might find a ready cash market for their wheat at spot prices.

Mr. Huff reported the institution by the grain corporation since June 11 of a large and active trade in wheat to Europe. The corporation had rounded out its domestic organization, he said, by the recent purchase of a big commission house with offices in Duluth, Minneapolis and Great Falls, Mont., taking over its assets and personnel intact.

Of the prospects for 1931, he said:

"I would estimate conservatively that we shall handle 200,000,000 bushels of wheat next year. If the weather man hits the areas in which we are not so well organized it may be 300,000,000 or more bushels."

Handling Much From Southwest.

One-third of the present wheat crop in the Southwest is being handled by the corporation, Mr. Huff estimated, saying that 32 per cent of the wheat going into Kansas City was cooperative grain.

The Grain Corporation is one leg of the Farm Board hook-up. Working with it and aided by Federal funds, the privately managed cooperatives lend to growers 85 per cent of the value of their crops. There also is the Stabilization Corporation, now inactive, which purchased 69,000,000 bushels of last year's crop and withdrew it from the market in an effort to relieve the condition caused by the excessive surplus.

In contrast with less optimistic opinions expressed by other observers of the surplus problem, Mr. Huff said:

"There seems to be every sound reason to predict that the price of wheat will be more favorable. I am not now advising farmers to hold their wheat for better prices, but I do say that everything in the picture is favorable for an increase in the near future."

He gave as one reason for this prediction his observation of the effect of the drought on the corn acreage.

"My information is that wheat is going into livestock feeding at the greatest rate in the last twenty years," he said. "Reports from Kansas and Texas indicate that thousands of farmers are keeping a lot of their cheaper wheat, grinding and mixing and using it for food. As 2,500,000,000 bushels of corn are raised annually in this country, it can be seen that any large substitution of wheat for corn will mean a large reduction in the wheat surplus."

Activity in Foreign Trade.

Regarding the activity of the corporation abroad, Mr. Huff said:

"Our export department made its first sales to Europe on June 11 and has become a most important factor in the foreign field. On one day recently we made eight sales in foreign ports. The first five days of this week our export wheat sales were 1,000,000 bushels.

"We delivered one lot of wheat directly from farmers in the Southwest to the door of a cooperative consumers' society mill in Scotland, a direct sale from producer to consumer without any other agency intervening. Thus, three or four profit-taking agencies were eliminated."

There is a healthy demand for wheat abroad, in contrast with conditions a year ago, Mr. Huff asserted, adding that the chartering of boats by the corporation and means adopted to move wheat rapidly had eased the congestion that had existed at terminals.

Mr. Huff's views were supplemented by a statement issued by the Department of Agriculture as to the substitution of wheat for corn in feeding live stock.

"The average farm price of corn last month was about 79 cents a bushel," the statement read. "At this price for corn, wheat is worth about 85 cents for feeding to poultry and sheep and about 89 cents for feeding to hogs and beef cattle. The average farm price of wheat July 15 was about 80 cents a bushel.

"Based on digestible nutriments, wheat and corn are of practically equal value pound for pound. Hence, a bushel of wheat is worth more than a bushel of corn in feeding value, and a bushel of wheat weights four pounds, or 7 per cent more than a bushel of shelled corn."

Quinn-Sheperdson Purchase.

WASHINGTON, July 26 (AP).—President Huff of the Farmers' National Grain Corporation announced here today the corporation's purchase of the Quinn-Sheperdson Company of Minneapolis to complete its domestic set-up. At the Farm Board the action was interpreted to mean that within eight months the American wheat farmers, through cooperative effort, had acquired sufficient bargaining power to command the choice position in trade channels never before open to them as individuals.

Purchase of the Quinn-Sheperdson Company, Mr. Huff said, completed organization in the Spring wheat region and gave the Grain Corporation its five divisional agencies—one each in the Pacific Coast area, the Spring wheat belt, the Northeast, Southeast and Southwest.

Each division, he said, had branch agencies in all sections of every wheat State it served, and in the year since its authorization the corporation was taking or ready to take wheat from all parts of the United States.

The Quinn-Sheperdson acquisition opened terminal facilities to the corporation at Duluth, Minneapolis and Great Falls, Mont., with division headquarters at St. Paul, Minn., Mr. Huff stated. While not as large as the Hall-Baker Company, purchased for $3,000,000 and used as an outlet for Southwestern wheat, the company occupied a similarly strategic position in its area. It is one of the largest concerns in the Northwest and has an important line of country connections.

TENNESSEE LETTER BY HOOVER RESENTED

Representative Reece's Primary Opponent Sees Interference by President.

Special to The New York Times.

JOHNSON CITY, Tenn., July 26.—A national aspect appeared today in the battle of Sam W. Price and Carroll Reece for the Republican nomination for the House from the First District, which Mr. Reece now holds, when a letter from President Hoover endorsing Mr. Reece's attitude in Congress on the Muscle Shoals bill was made public.

Mr. Price expressed resentment at what he regarded as the President's taking a hand in the primary campaign.

The letter to Representative Reece reads:

My Dear Mr. Reece:

I hear that your opponents are charging you with failure to serve the interest of your constituents because you refused to accept the Senate plan for dealing with Muscle Shoals.

The fact is that the House plan will secure developments of this great resource more effectively and more greatly in the interests of Tennessee than would the Senate plan. I am assured that the Senate plan cannot be passed in the House. Nor would I approve the plan, because it is not in the interest of Tennessee or the rest of the nation. Your course has been the only one that will secure an advancement of this development in the interest of the people of Tennessee.

Yours faithfully,
HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. Price, after expressing the view that it was not proper for one to presume to reply to a letter of the President, written to an individual and by the latter given to the press, said in part:

"I shall get along with the President when elected. I am a Republican. I campaigned all over the State of Tennessee for Mr. Hoover in his race for President.

"However, I am opposed to any attempt at political dictatorship in a free country. The people of the First Congressional District have always been independent and resent the implication that they do not know what is best for them and that they have to be advised by men who do not know how they shall vote.

"The time has not come in this district when any man, before offering himself for office, must make a pilgrimage to the distant shrine of a great political boss and humbly climb up the golden stairway to the throne and kiss his majesty's great toe and beg to be anointed with the privilege of asking the voters of his district to support him.

"I am taking my case to the people of this district. They know me and I trust them."

RICCI'S PARENTS LOSE FIGHT ON ADOPTION

California Court of Appeals Dismisses Their Appeal Over Boy Violinists.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 26.—Peter and Emma Ricci lost in the courts today their fight to prevent Miss Mary Elizabeth Lackey, Berkeley music teacher, from being declared the legal guardian of their sons, Ruggiero and Giorgio Ricci, violin prodigies.

The California District Court of Appeals dismissed the parents' appeal contesting Miss Lackey's right to the custody of the children.

Ricci and his wife had contended that the courts had awarded the guardianship of their children to the music teacher without due notice to the parents. Today's decision was to the effect that such formal notice was not necessary inasmuch as the father and mother had signed a document relinquishing their custody to the music teacher.

The court also upheld Miss Lackey's right to fix New York as the residence of the two boys.

Similar proceedings contesting Miss Lackey's guardianship are pending in the New York Supreme Court.

Early in June, before Supreme Court Justice Valente in Manhattan, Pietro Ricci, California bandmaster, brought suit against Miss Mary Elizabeth Lackey, assistant to Louis Persinger, San Francisco teacher, who made Yehudi Menuhin a virtuoso, to regain custody of his two sons, Ruggiero, 9 years old, and Giorgio, 8 years old.

The elder boy, trained by Persinger, is a violin prodigy and created a sensation upon his first appearance here with the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra last Fall. Miss Lackey became guardian of him and his brother, who is also a remarkable violin player.

At the trial before Justice Valente it was testified that Miss Lackey was "exploiting" the children. Frederick H. Bartlett, director of the Sinclair Oil Company, who paid for the boys' training and maintenance until last January, said he withdrew his support when he learned Miss Lackey was to receive half the earnings of each boy until he was 21.

Justice Valente reserved decision.

F. T. MILLER ASKS $50,000.

Writer Charges Injuries From Electric Shock in Hotel Wolcott.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., July 26.—Francis Trevelyan Miller, writer and historian, claims personal damages of $50,000 in a negligence action filed here today against Julius Manger of 821 Wolf's Lane, Pelham Manor, and others allegedly responsible for the management of the Hotel Wolcott at 4 West Thirty-first Street, New York.

Mr. Miller alleges that on March 13 while he was attempting to plug a lamp cord into the floor board in his room in the hotel he received "a severe electric shock from a short circuit occurring in or about said lamp cord or connection due to the dangerous condition of same and was violently thrown to the floor and was seriously shocked, burned and injured in and about the body."

Mr. Miller charged the injuries kept him from writing so that he was unable to fulfill several contracts.

Julius Manger is named individually in the suit, and as the executor and trustee of the estate of William Manger. Also named as defendants are the Wolcott Operating Corporation, Thirty-first and Fifth Avenue Corporation, the Mid-Centre Operating Corporation and the Bell Securities Company.

MORRISSEY ESCAPES DISASTER IN THE ICE

Fishing Net Tangled in Propeller Holds Ship, While Floe Sweeps Upon It.

STEERING GEAR IS BENT

Cakes Smash Boat Against Bank, but Free Her Without Cracking Her Sides.

By CAPT. ROBERT A. BARTLETT,
Leader of the Bartlett Expedition to Northeast Greenland.

World Copyright, 1930, by the New York Times Company. All Rights Reserved.

ON BOARD THE SCHOONER MORRISSEY, July 24 (Via London).—Caught in a nutcracker of ice, the sturdy little Morrissey came within an inch of disaster only to prove her strength again and emerge the victor in a battle with the elements. Tonight she was riding safely at anchor as though nothing had happened.

For a few moments the little schooner came so close to being crushed in the relentless ice that I wondered if our expedition was at an end almost before it had begun. It is an experience such as this one was that gives one the feeling of living a lifetime in a few minutes.

It happened when only eight men were aboard the ship. They had remained behind while the others went ashore to work with Junius Bird. The fog was hanging heavily seaward, and heavy ice was drifting past us in the fog, swept along by a strong current.

There was not any too much room between us and the standing ice, and the situation made us watch home plate, for if we were caught off under such conditions we were out of luck; that's all.

The watch was on deck about 8 P. M. and Harry Whitney and I were watching over the stern to get a shot at a seal. Everything was peaceful and quiet.

Crunching Noise Is Heard.

Finally the seal came in. Harry fired and killed it. We went over the side in a canoe to get the body and had just returned to the ship, where a man was cutting it up and preserving the stomach for the Smithsonian Institution, when we heard a crunching noise against the side.

We ran on deck and there we saw about two miles over the port bow a dark ribbon across the white face of the pack ice. Instantly everything was in a state of commotion. My big Plankton net was out, and the strong current running under the ice kept it fishing. In paying out astern the net caught on the blades of the propeller.

The engine room felt it and stopped the engine. But before we could clear to open water a corner of the ice sheet caught us. A piece doubled up under the propeller. That made it impossible for the engine to operate.

Finally we were able with dynamite to free the propeller. All we could do then was to wait and hope for the strong south wind to slacken and with the ebb tide carry the big ice sheet away from us for an hour or two. But our hopes were not answered so easily, for the outflow of water from the fjords, the tide and the wind kept the ice pressed hard against the Morrissey's staunch little sides as it slipped out to sea.

Big Chunks Buffet the Ship.

We were powerless—shaken about like a rat in the grip of a terrier's teeth. The Morrissey lay there a target for the big chunks as they came, hitting her stern and buffeting her on the exposed side, lifting her up and twisting her around. Once she was hurled with terrific force against the bank and was held there for a minute or two, only to struggle free and resume the battle again.

Soon the ice showed traces of the Morrissey's nice red paint as it scraped along her keel and swept out to sea. At length a big chunk hit her good and hard. Up came the stern. Part of the worm steering gear was bent and carried away. This was the last hard punch and we were afloat soon afterward in open water without a crack in the Morrissey's sides.

The question then was, "Is the propeller still there?" To tell the truth not one of us, particularly those who had spent more than thirty years in the Arctic, thought it possible that this part of the craft was undamaged. I could hardly wait for the engine to turn over. Anxiously I went to the engine room and watched breathlessly while the engine began to move.

Then I saw the clutch thrown in. The shaft began to revolve and I rushed on deck to see all hands cheering as we moved away from the menacing ice. To the workmen who melted the brass that made that propeller and shaft I said "God bless you."

They did a good job and saved us a lot of trouble.

MISSED BOAT WHICH SANK.

Nine Honduran Beauty Contestants Believe Tardiness Saved Lives.

TEGUCIGALPA, Honduras, July 26 (AP).—Nine of the prettiest girls in Honduras, bound for a beauty contest here to select a "Miss Honduras" for the forthcoming international beauty contest at Rio de Janeiro, today agreed that by missing a boat they had probably been saved from drowning in the reptile infested waters of Lake Yojoa.

They had tickets and reservations aboard the steamer Segovia, which yesterday sank in the lake with fifty-six bags of American mail and cargo. Passengers and crew were taken safely to shore.

The girls were detained by social engagements which made them miss the sailing by thirty minutes. As none of them can swim, their tardiness apparently saved them from death. The waters of Lake Yojoa abound in alligators.

AMELI FOR NIGHT COURT

Would Have Commissioners Take Turns in Sitting at Night—Tuttle Withholds Comment.

After the first batch of persons arrested for liquor law offenses had spent a night in jail because they could not get bail, the Federal authorities in Manhattan and Brooklyn yesterday took preliminary steps to meet the situation caused by the refusal of the city magistrates to handle bail bonds in prohibition cases.

In Brooklyn United States Attorney Ameli proposed the creation of a special Federal night court, before which prisoners could be promptly arraigned. In New York, however, a conference between Federal Judge John C. Knox and Commissioner Cotter resulted in a determination to allow the victims of night raids, for the time being at least, to stay awhile in jail. Establishment of a night court may be considered later, they said.

The plight of the Volstead act offenders arises from the fact that there are now no officials to sign bail bonds for them at night. The United States Commissioners sit only during the daytime and have been instructed not to fix or accept bail at night. Previous to this reversal of policy on Friday, magistrates had admitted prohibition violators to bail pending appearance before a Federal commissioner.

Twenty-five persons accused of prohibition violations were brought before Commissioner Cotter yesterday morning and all of them had spent the night in jails.

"There were never so many before fresh from jail," the commissioner said. "Most of them would have been out on bail under the old procedure."

He said that the people had made no complaints but he pointed out that all were in the small bootlegger class and many had appeared in court before. In Brooklyn about the same number were arraigned. Among attendants at both courts there was speculation as to what might happen if some person of prominence should be arrested as a patron in a restaurant raid and find himself unable to get bail.

As a result of the new system, fifteen men who were arrested yesterday afternoon and last night for alleged liquor law violations, were held in various police stations in Manhattan and the Bronx with no chance of getting out of jail under their arraignment tomorrow in Federal Court. However, three others who were booked for prohibition law violations obtained bail, two of them from County Judge James M. Barrett of the Bronx and one from Special Sessions Judge William A. Walling.

The distribution of the prisoners who must spend the week-end in jail was as follows: Clinton Street station, 5; East Sixty-seventh Street station, 8; Morrisania station, 1; Wadsworth Avenue station, 1.

United States Attorney Tuttle again refused to comment on the situation yesterday, leaving the whole matter to the judges of the district.

Night Court Faces Delay.

"It appears now that it may be necessary," Mr. Ameli announced yesterday, "to establish a night court in the Brooklyn Federal Building presided over by commissioners who will serve in rotation, accompanied by a sufficient force of deputy marshals, elevator operators and others.

"Much detail must attend the creation of such a court since the men working in it should be paid for overtime. Meanwhile those arrested in speakeasies at night will have to get along the best they can."

In Mr. Ameli's district, which includes Brooklyn, Queens and Richmond, Senior Federal Judge Marcus B. Campbell some time ago forbade the Federal commissioners to sign bail bonds at night after there had been charges of irregularities. It is understood that Judge Campbell was asked soon afterward to consider the question of a night court but at the time he opposed the idea.

Following a morning of arraignments before him of depressed prisoners with a night in police station cells behind them, United States Commissioner Cotter talked for half an hour with Judge Knox, the presiding judge in the Federal district which includes Manhattan and the Bronx. At the termination of the conference Judge Knox announced the continuance of the present situation.

Fears Bail Bond Graft.

"We decided to do nothing for the time being," he said. "We don't want to be put in the position of facilitating such evil practices connected with night bailing as have been recently charged. We think that this evil may be worse than the possibility that people who are arrested in the evening will have to spend a night in jail. Anyhow, we are disposed to see how the situation works out."

The judge pointed out that there had been allegations of extortion and corruption in connection with the supplying of bail and that he felt very loath to do anything to help out corrupt bail runners or their colleagues.

"If there are evils I don't want to perpetuate them," he said. "I don't want to be party to any man's racket. If the facts are as stated it might be just as well to let people know they may have to go to jail if they don't obey the law."

Judge Knox intimated that there was a possibility of the appointment eventually of a new commissioner who might sit at night. The power of making such an appointment resides in the judges of each district.

It was indicated that the creation of a night court would bring up other local problems. One of these would be the question of whether the city police, who make most of the liquor arrests, would bring the prisoners on the night of their arrest from the local precincts where the raids are made to the Federal court.

GAMBLE URGES DRY REPEAL.

Mamaroneck Official, Candidate for Assembly, Wants New Laws.

Special to The New York Times.

MAMARONECK, July 26.—Ralph A. Gamble, corporation counsel of the town of Mamaroneck and Republican organization candidate for the Assembly in the Second District to succeed Assemblyman Herbert B. Shonk of Scarsdale, retiring this year, came out today in favor of the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and pledged himself to work for new legislation to improve conditions of liquor control.

"I am in favor of the repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead act as I am for modification and real temperance, and we have never had either under these enactments," he declared.

"I am in favor of laws being enacted to replace the Eighteenth Amendment and Volstead act that will result in giving to the people of this country a proper personal liberty and real temperance without the return of the saloon; laws that will give to all people, rich and poor, equal consideration; that will have the support of the people to the extent that they can be successfully enforced, and that will breed a new respect for law and order and end the present intolerable and hypocritical conditions."

BOY SLAIN, DRY AGENT HELD

Georgia Investigator Says Youth Tried to Grab Pistol.

COLUMBUS, Ga., July 26 (AP).—Chief of Police M. D. Gill swore out a warrant today for W. J. Johnson Jr., Federal prohibition agent, charging him with the murder of Ray Rodgers, 19, who was shot to death by the officer here last night. Johnson is confined in the city jail.

Fred B. Dismuke, Federal prohibition administrator for the Middle Georgia district, arrived here today from Macon with seven prohibition agents who are assisting him in conducting an investigation of the shooting.

Rodgers was shot last night in the back yard of a residence here. The prohibition agent said that when Rodgers and a girl companion arrived in an automobile he flashed a light into the car, and that Rodgers and the girl, who told police she was Eunice Johnson, 19, grabbed for his pistol. During the fight for the gun, Johnston said, Rodgers was shot. The girl said no effort had been made to take Johnston's pistol.

The prohibition agent said Rodgers was caught in the act of delivering a gallon of liquor.

ATLANTIC CITY CAFE RAIDED

The Beaux Arts Yields Alleged Liquor—Guests Detained.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., July 26.—Raiding the Beaux Arts Café at Virginia Avenue and the Boardwalk early this morning, prohibition agents arrested six men and seized a quantity of alleged liquor after locking all the doors so that none of the patrons or employes could leave while the search was being made. Scores of men and women in evening clothes were dancing when the agents entered and all were requested to resume their seats.

The seizure was reported to include four barrels of beer, a quart each of alleged gin and Scotch and a half gallon of other liquor.

The raiders descended upon the bar of the café after one of the agents is said to have bought liquor.

CAR KILLS TWO ON ROAD.

Injures Third of Group Standing Beside Auto Near Ashboro, N. C.

ASHBORO, N. C., July 26 (AP).—Will and Joe Clapp, brothers, were killed and their cousin, R. M. Clapp, was seriously injured today when they were struck by an automobile while standing alongside their own car on a highway about seven miles from here. All three lived in Graham, N. C.

Sampson Newman of Level Cross, Randolph County, and William Vanderbeck of Brooklyn, N. Y., occupants of the car which struck the Clapps, were arrested and brought to the county jail here.

Newman, according to officers, was the driver of the machine. Vanderbeck said he was "bumming" a ride and had been in Newman's car only a short while before the accident.

The Clapps had started for Pinehurst when one of the wheels of their automobile broke.

BULGARIA FOR BRIAND PLAN.

Ready to Give Fully and Freely Her Collaboration, Note Says.

PARIS, July 26 (AP).—The Foreign Office today made public the terms of the reply of Bulgaria to the proposal of Foreign Minister Aristide Briand for a European union. Bulgaria expressed "greatest sympathy" with the idea and added that the government was "ready to give fully and freely its collaboration."

The Bulgarian reply remarked that the basis of the union should be a "high moral idea of political and economic aid and protection of the weakest members of the organization." It further suggests that the proposed union should declare "Europe's moral unity and full equality of States, as well as the renunciation of war and other such international pressure."

The Balkan State asks fulfillment of all the ideals of the League of Nations regarding minorities and disarmament and suggests that Turkey ought to be invited, but recognizes that there may be "temporary obstacles in the way of Russian participation."

BACKS DESTRUCTION OF COUNT'S LIQUOR

Ameli Says Warnings Preceded Legal Action on de Polignac's $30,000 Supply.

LAWYER DISPUTES STAND

Tuttle's Name Omitted From Proposed Damage Suit Resulting From Loss.

United States Attorney Ameli of Brooklyn issued a statement yesterday describing his position with regard to $30,000 worth of liquor belonging to the Count Maxence de Polignac of Paris, which was destroyed after Mr. Ameli had obtained an order on default. Thomas O'Rourke Gallagher, counsel for the Count, has threatened to sue Mr. Ameli and Jesse D. Moore, United States Marshal, both of whom hold office in the Eastern District of New York, to recover damages on the surety bonds of the two men. Mr. Gallagher said he had decided to omit the name of Charles H. Tuttle, United States Attorney for the Southern District, from his prospective suit.

Mr. Ameli's statement, parts of which Mr. Gallagher disputed, was as follows:

"This office was served on July 25, 1930, with an order signed by Judge Bondy of the Southern District, the order being dated July 1, 1930, granting the motion of Thomas O'Rourke Gallagher, attorney for Joseph M. Dooley and others, to suppress evidence and return property seized on June 6, 1929, at the warehouse of the Joseph M. Dooley Fireproof Warehouse Corporation, 445 Twelfth Street, Brooklyn. This was the first intimation that this office had ever had of any such proceeding, which, it appears, was carried on in the Southern District of New York, in spite of the fact that the seizure took place in the Eastern District.

Lists Liquor That Was Seized.

"Examination of the records of this office shows that on June 6, 1929, special agents of the prohibition unit seized 408 bottles of alleged Gilbey gin, 600 bottles of alleged cognac, 215 bottles of alleged champagne and 516 bottles of alleged Canadian Club rye whisky from the Dooley warehouse at 445 Twelfth Street, Brooklyn.

"The liquor was stored at the Army Base under Lot 39085, and on July 1, 1929, this office filed a libel against this property and other property, as listed in the libel, known as 'The United States against One Quart Bottle partly filled with whisky, and other lots.'

"Notice of this libel, which specifically set forth the item here in question and the other items thereon in detail, was published on July 9, 1929, on page 12 of The Brooklyn Citizen, as appears from affidavits on file in the office of the clerk.

"The United States Marshal, in accordance with the usual custom and practice, in addition to publishing the notice served a copy of the monition on Joseph M. Dooley at 445 Twelfth Street, Brooklyn. No notice of appearance or claim or intervention, or any other application or notice of any kind, was ever interposed by anybody on behalf of this item, and so, there being a default, on Aug. 22, 1929, an order was signed by Judge Marcus B. Campbell directing the forfeiture and destruction of the property. This property, together with the other property scheduled in the same libel, was destroyed between Oct. 30 and Nov. 11, 1929, by the United States Marshal at the Army Base.

Question's Ameli's Statement.

Mr. Ameli's statement that his office had never had any knowledge of the proceeding to regain possession of the liquor until the order was delivered to him on Friday was questioned by Mr. Gallagher yesterday. He said that on June 24, 1929, he sent to Mr. Ameli's office an order to show cause why the liquor should not be returned. This he expected to be signed by an Eastern District judge, but the order, he said, was sent back from Mr. Ameli's office with the advice that since the matter was pending in the Southern District the order should be taken there.

Mr. Gallagher further said that the form of blanket libel used did not identify the particular seizure from the Dooley warehouse, and that this form of libel has been severely censured by the United States Supreme Court.

The libel itself was missing from the files in Mr. Ameli's office yesterday, and, though it is said to be the custom there to place a card in the files showing that papers have been removed, no card was present to indicate its removal.

Though there was said to be on file in Marshal Moore's office a return showing that Mr. Dooley had been served with the notice by mail, Mr. Gallagher said that neither he nor Mr. Dooley received notice that a libel had been filed.

"Even had Mr. Ameli not learned of the case from a legal notice," said Mr. Gallagher, "he must have read about the case in the newspapers, which published a great deal about the matter."

SHOOTS GIRL AND ENDS OWN LIFE IN HER HOME

Butler Had Been Repulsed by Yonkers Woman When She Found He Was Married.

Unable to effect a reconciliation after Hertha Ectarode found he was already married, Charles Zyben, a butler from Jersey City, shot and seriously wounded her in the attic of her Yonker's home at 10 o'clock yesterday morning and then killed himself.

Miss Ectarode, who is expected to recover, told Police Chief Edward Quirk and Captain James Cashin later at St. Joseph's Hospital that Zyben, who came over from Germany a few years ago, had been attentive for some time. Only recently, she said, she learned that he already had a wife and family in Brooklyn, and she immediately told him he must not see her again.

In spite of that, she said, he came to the house at 133 Alexander Avenue, where she lives with her mother, Mrs. A. U. Ectarode.

She said she left him in a downstairs room and that he followed her into the attic, where the double shooting occurred.

PORTUGAL BARES PLOT TO DISRUPT REPUBLIC

Propagandists, Smuggled Into Barracks to Undermine Army Morale, Foiled by Loyal Men.

LISBON, Portugal, July 26 (AP).—The government today issued a lengthy manifesto to the Portuguese nation exposing details of the recent plot to overthrow the republic.

The paper said propagandists have been smuggled into barracks to undermine the morale of troops and that soldiers and non-commissioned officers had supported the plot with funds, the money being obtained for a so-called campaign to combat illiteracy. Bribes were offered to officers of high rank to join the organization, it is said.

The manifesto added that all of the efforts came to naught before the loyalty of the army and police, who dealt a crushing blow to the plot. The statement continued that measures to enable the dictatorship to continue its work of national restoration were supported by the loyal element.

The conspirators, according to the manifesto, had planned a three days' pillage of civilians, confiscation of property of the supporters of the dictatorship, feudal rule and indemnities to all who "suffered material or moral harm since the establishment of the dictatorship."

The manifesto says that, if this latest revolutionary movement had succeeded, mob rule would have prevailed and that only chaos could have resulted.

RESCINDS POLICE ORDER.

Valley Stream Mayor Changes Edict for State Park Patrol.

Special to The New York Times.

VALLEY STREAM, L. I., July 26.—Mayor Arthur J. Hendrickson of this village, on his way to the police chiefs' conference at Rochester today, telegraphed local officials to rescind the order for twelve special policemen to patrol the State park area along Merrick Road and Curtiss Field along Sunrise Highway. The local Board of Trustees adopted a resolution last Wednesday authorizing Mayor Hendrickson to employ the special officers.

The order was countermanded because Nassau County police officials felt that the village would be overlapping the duties of the county system. Captain Comstock, head of the county police at Valley Stream, said today he would appoint ten or twelve extra patrolmen for the week-ends.

FIND $90,000 LIQUOR UNCLAIMED AT PIER

Customs Men Seize 150 Kegs, Each in Crated Tin Box, Labeled 'Serpentine Paper.'

CONSIGNEE DISCLAIMS IT

Broker Denies Knowing of Goods Billed to Him—Trap Laid by Agents Is Fruitless.

Whisky valued at $90,000, bootleg prices, was discovered yesterday by treasury agents in 150 cases marked "serpentine paper," which had been lying for the last ten days on Pier 86, Forty-sixth Street and the Hudson River, unclaimed by the consignee, a reputable customs broker, whose name was not made public by the agents.

The real nature of the shipment was learned when a longshoreman, moving some of the wooden cases, crashed in one of the crates. Customs Inspector Irwin Haskins and Samuel Bernstein noticed a tin case inside.

"That's strange," he said, "shipping serpentine paper in tin."

Haskins and Bernstein reported this circumstance to their superiors and Treasury agents were sent to watch the consignment. The agents waited around the piers, disguised as longshoremen, but no one called to claim the goods. The agents became impatient yesterday and opened one of the cases.

Inside the tin covering they found a fifteen-gallon keg of whisky. One after another of the crates was opened, and each yielded the same quantity of liquor.

Investigation disclosed that the cases had arrived at the pier July 12 on the Hamburg American liner Hamburg. The liquor, 2,250 gallons in all, was taken to the army base at Governor's Island. The customs men said they had interviewed the broker listed as consignee of the shipment, but that he had denied knowing anything about it.

CHANCELLOR FLINT CHALLENGES WETS

He Asks Wadsworth and Andrews What They Would Set Up in Place of the Dry Law.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., July 26 (AP).—Chancellor Charles W. Flint of Syracuse University in an open letter to two leaders of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment today challenged the "purity of the motives" of that organization.

In his letter to William S. Andrews of Syracuse, a former justice of the Court of Appeals, and former Senator James W. Wadsworth, directors of the association, Chancellor Flint asked these questions:

"What definite proposal have you to set forth to replace the present provision dealing with the evils of the liquor traffic?

"In view of the declared purpose of your association, does membership in the association imply scrupulous personal observance of the law?

"And are the association and its members pledged to active support of efforts to secure obedience to the prohibition laws?"

Continuing, the educator's letter reads:

"I understand one of the purposes of your organization, as stated in the articles of incorporation, to be: 'To favor and encourage obedience to the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution and all laws passed to carry into effect the provisions of that amendment, at the same time conducting an educational campaign to convince the electorate that its repeal would be for the best interests of the country.'

"To put it frankly and squarely, will you and the members of your association by personal observance of the law and by active cooperation honestly encourage obedience to the Eighteenth Amendment and supporting laws, even if this may so improve conditions as to weaken the effectiveness of the argument most used by your group, viz., 'It can't be enforced.'"

EDURANCE FLIERS BEGIN SEVENTH DAY

Reichers and Black Stunt Over Roosevelt Field to Celebrate Progress.

LABOR DAY NOW THE GOAL

Four Contacts Made to Refuel the Plane—Fliers Appear to Be In Good Condition.

Special to The New York Times.

ROOSEVELT FIELD, L. I., July 26. — Louis Reichers and Robert Black, the two pilots of the Stinson monoplane now trying to set a new endurance record at this field, celebrated the beginning of the last day of their first week aloft shortly before 8:34 o'clock tonight by stunting their plane to break the monotony of the 144-hour grind. With still some seventeen days to go before they equal the record of 553 hours set by the Hunter brothers in Chicago July 4, the two fliers are reported by their refueling pilots to be in excellent spirits and physical condition and still resolved to remain in the air until Labor Day.

The four refueling operations which furnished the fliers with gasoline, oil, food and other necessities of life all went off smoothly. Just before darkness fell the last contact passed sufficient fuel to last until dawn. John S. Donaldson and Philip Watson continued to operate the "nursing plane," a duplicate of the endurance ship. The contacts were made above a slight ground haze which extended nearly 1,000 feet up due to the heat.

The new heat wave did not interfere with the flying conditions other than to bring with it a slight ground haze, according to the pilots of the refueling plane, John S. Donaldson and Philip Watson.

The endurance plane droned over a set course around the flying fields adjacent to Mineola and Garden City, flying at about 2,000 feet to conform with the rules. At night the altitude is increased out of consideration for near-by residents, who once threatened to obtain a restraining order against the continued noise of the engine.

Once every twenty minutes the plane passes directly over the observers on the field on its endless course. Friends and relatives of the two men have watched since the flight began on July 20.

NO LET-UP REPORTED IN ENDURANCE TESTS

Bat Threats by Police and Other Officials in Some Localities Become More Stern.

Seekers after endurance records throughout the country remained diligently at their tasks yesterday.

The tree-sitters were still aloft in their perches despite the threats of county officers and officials of children's societies to have them removed. Bicycle riders were pedaling away, with the New Brunswick (N. J.) team ahead of its nearest competitors, the Philadelphia marathoners; with the Hillside (N. Y.) trio third.

In the water endurance contest, Mrs. Myrtle Hudleston and Miss Corrine Vossberg passed their seventy-ninth hour in the Rockaway pool.

Baseball Pitchers Keep On.

The baseball pitching endurance contest, the only one of its kind, which is being held in Bloomfield, N. J., drew quite a large crowd of holiday fans yesterday afternoon, when the eight pitchers moved to the Bloomfield Athletic Field in James Street, where they passed their ninety-ninth hour at 5 P. M. yesterday. Somebody counted the number of times a ball was thrown. He said 3,000 catches were made every hour. This contest began last Tuesday and shows no signs of halting.

Robert Parsell, 13 years old, of Cloister, N. J., a tree sitter, has attached to his tree a sign: "Please feed and water," under which hangs a pail. Passers-by dropped coins in it.

An unexpected obstacle, however, may put an end to all Camden's record seekers, now far in the lead with 291 hours to their credit. Director of Public Safety David S. Rhone has threatened to call out the police to end this "entirely foolish" tree-sitting contest.

In Hackensack, Royden C. Barton celebrated his birthday fourteen feet above the ground. His mother sent up a special birthday cake.

Florida newspaper publishers took official cognizance of all the record seekers yesterday and at a special meeting adopted a resolution to the effect that no editorial comment would be made of the contests. They described the tree sitting branch of the tests as "a recrudescence of ape-like tendencies on the part of the younger generation."

Greenpoint Boys Examined.

Greenpoint's bicycle riders in Brooklyn were examined yesterday at the request of Alderman Peter J. McGuinness and all were found in perfect condition; they have their parents' consent to continue. They passed the 126th hour at 6 P. M.

Peter Soriano, 13, of Tarrytown, claimed the tree-sitting championship of that place yesterday when at noon he had been aloft for seventy-four hours. He hurled a defi at the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children officials, who had threatened to remove him, and announced his intention of remaining aloft for ten days.

In Chappaqua four boys have been riding around the new station plaza on a bicycle for the past fifty hours. Their efforts have not always won the plaudits of their buddies in the village, who at times have hurled several species of fruit of varying ages at the contestants.

The "professional" riders of Morristown, N. J., who are receiving 2 cents an hour each from their father, are determined to keep going until the endurance of their mother, Mrs. Edgar Dixon, gives out, she announced yesterday. Mrs. Dixon is chef, timekeeper and cheer leader for her sons. Two boys in the same town are very anxious to start a canoe contest, but they need a canoe.

Three Are Taken Off Liner.

A radio message was received at the offices of the White Star Line yesterday from Captain J. Bulman, master, that three unregistered passengers were carried out when the ship sailed late Friday night. The three men, described by the captain as "two visitors and one stowaway," were taken from the ship while it was still in the harbor and sent ashore on a tug.

BAY STATE PASTOR CONTINUES ON TANKER

Rev. W. L. McKinney Arrives at Port Arthar as Seaman and Lands Shipmates.

PORT ARTHUR, Texas, July 26 (AP).—Nine days in the forecastle of an oil tanker failed to dim the enthusiasm of the Rev. William Lord McKinney, pastor of the old First Parish Church at Bridgewater, Mass., who arrived here today as an ordinary seaman aboard the steamship Cities Service Ansas. He is on a month's vacation.

"Known as "Doc" to his forecastle mates and as "Admiral" to the officers, the Rev. Mr. McKinney held his first religious service on a ship at sea Sunday. He stood a regular lookout and wheel watch with the crew and said he found seafaring life worth while.

Immediately upon boarding the vessel at Philadelphia, the pastor said he noted a marked decrease in the profanity of the seamen.

A robust man in his forties, the Rev. Mr. McKinney is well tanned and in perfect health as the result of his vacation. The steamer will leave here for a foreign port Monday and the pastor expects to continue with it until his month's vacation is over.

"They're a great bunch," he declared, speaking of his shipmates, "always ready to do their bit and the finest sort of comrades."

Vetoes Buses for Mount Vernon.

Mayor James Berg announced yesterday that he would veto the ordinances to permit substitution of buses for trolley cars in Mount Vernon on the ground that a clause gives the Third Avenue Railway Company the right to introduce trackless trolleys after ten years. He said one advantage of buses would be the removal of poles and wires as well as tracks and that to bring trackless trolleys back would mean putting up the poles and wires again.

MULROONEY ENDS PARK POLICE SQUAD

EFFICIENCY IS AIM OF MOVE

Central Park to Be Covered by Regular "Beats"—Fitzgibbons Status Corrected.

Police Commissioner Mulrooney abolished one of the prize assignments in his department yesterday as a measure intended to increase efficiency and add to the number of men available for patrol duty. In a special order the forty policemen hitherto assigned to the special day squad in Central Park were transferred to regular patrol duty at various precincts.

The special day squad was looked upon by policemen as a "soft spot." Its members, whose duty it was to prevent vandalism and watch over children in the playgrounds, were exempt from the late duty from midnight to 8 A. M. to which other members of the force are subject. Only veteran policemen with unblemished records were admitted to the squad and then only after special application.

With the squad abolished, its duties will be taken over by the policemen regularly assigned to posts in the park from adjoining precincts. The special policemen had roving assignments in the park, and their chief duty was the serving of summonses upon persons who trespassed upon the lawns and littered the park with papers and remnants of lunches.

The same special order terminated the assignment of Acting Lieutenant Patrick Fitzgibbons as commanding officer of the musical company. At first it was thought that the man who was demoted by the late Commissioner Joseph A. Warren and reinstated by former Commissioner Grover A. Whalen was in trouble again, but Police Commissioner Mulrooney explained that the order was designed merely to correct a technical error.

When Mr. Whalen became commissioner he gave Fitzgibbons command of the Police Glee Club and made Lieutenant William T. Mahoney leader of the band, in accordance with revised regulations dividing the musical company into two units. Fitzgibbons, rating as commander of the musical company, was restored, however, through an oversight.

Because Fitzgibbons never actually had command of the band, yesterday's order does not change his status, as he remains in charge of the Glee Club, Mr. Mulrooney explained. Two weeks ago, after the bombing of the Simplon Club in Fifth Avenue, Fitzgibbons was transferred from the command of the Manhattan gun squad to the leadership of the one in Harlem and Washington Heights.

The order making these changes also noted the dismissal of a policeman for intoxication, neglect of duty and failure to arrest the person who supplied the intoxicant. The policeman was Thomas F. Ryan of the East Fifty-first Street station, who, on the night of June 20, was declared unfit for duty by his superior officers.

TWO HELD AS THIEVES AS AIDES FLEE SHOTS

Brooklyn Policeman Stops Car Containing Silk Stolen From Manhattan Concern.

After their two companions had escaped in a shower of bullets fired by a patrolman, Abraham Meinster, 24 years old, of 307 Dumont Avenue, Brooklyn, and Irving Sherman, 25, of 1,580 Prospect Place, Brooklyn, were arrested in a hired automobile early yesterday at Saratoga Avenue and St. Mark's Place, Brooklyn, and charged with a Manhattan burglary committed two hours before.

Later the two men were said by the police to have admitted that, with their two companions, they had broken into the loft occupied by the Lowenstein Silk Company, 133-137 West Eighteenth Street, and stolen the twenty-nine rolls of silk found in the automobile.

The men were arrested by Patrolman Eggolt, who stopped them for questioning. As he did so, two of the men jumped from the car and fled. Eggolt fired several shots after them.

Meinster and Sherman were arraigned later before Magistrate Silbermann in Jefferson Market court and held without bail for a hearing tomorrow. Both were said to have police records.

France Again Honors Col. Friedsam

The silver Medal of Honor of the French Ministry of Commerce has been awarded to Colonel Michael Friedsam, president of the Fifth Avenue Association and of B. Altman & Co. of New York, it was learned yesterday. The presentation was made at a luncheon presided over by the head of the Federation of Committees of Streets of Paris, at which Colonel Friedsam was the guest of honor. The award is in recognition of the assistance given by Colonel Friedsam in New York to the "exposition de la Rue St.-Honoré."

MULROONEY PLANS MORE CHARITY WORK

Starving Young Mother, Fainting at Police Outing, Cited as One of Several Cases.

HUSBAND IDLE FOR MONTHS

Social Welfare Supervisor Asked to Investigate Canarsie Woman's Need.

Because of the large number of destitute persons in the city, Police Commissioner Mulrooney said yesterday he was considering possible expansion of the welfare and relief work of his department. A dramatic incident that took place on one of the Police Department outings for needy families prompted his statement.

Mrs. Agnes Trent, 19-year-old mother of an infant less than a year old, was among the 791 adults who accompanied 1,481 children whom the police took on an excursion to the Hook Mountain, near Nyack, last Thursday. A few minutes after she stepped ashore, Mrs. Trent fainted and Police Surgeon Jerome Siegler found that she was suffering from starvation.

When Mrs. Trent regained consciousness, Commissioner Mulrooney said, she told Dr. Siegler she had not eaten for three days. Her husband had been out of work for several months, she declared. According to Mr. Mulrooney, Inspector Thompson took the woman to 69 Skidmore Lane, Carnarsie, where she said she lived. Reporters who called there yesterday were told that Mrs. Trent was unknown there.

Mr. Mulrooney said the woman's case was only one of several that had come to his attention. He has asked Mrs. S. Flora Klein, supervisor of social welfare work in the Eleventh Division in Brooklyn, to investigate Mrs. Trent's case and report to Deputy Inspector Louis Costuma, head of the Crime Prevention Bureau.

Every precinct in congested sections of the city has a lieutenant especially assigned to look after welfare work among members of the Police Department as well as civilians in the precinct. They report needy cases to charitable organizations. Mr. Mulrooney's statement was taken to mean that the scope of their work would be enlarged.

LYNCH-RENDT FIGHT CARRIED TO COURTS

Show Cause Writs Obtained by Staten Island Leaders in Democratic Clash.

RULING LIKELY TOMORROW

Justice Humphrey Orders Hearings on Claims of Rivals for County Chairmanship.

A judicial decision in the contest for the chairmanship of the Richmond County Democratic organization probably will be handed down tomorrow by Supreme Court Justice Humphrey in Brooklyn. Borough President John A. Lynch, who was elected to the office Monday, and Commissioner of Public Works David S. Rendt, the deposed chairman, both obtained from Justice Humphrey yesterday show-cause orders which were made returnable in the Brooklyn Supreme Court tomorrow morning.

The Borough President's order requires Mr. Rendt to show cause why he should not turn over all books, accounts and records of the organization to Mr. Lynch, and the order obtained by Rendt requires Lynch to show cause why he should not be enjoined from presiding over the county committee or usurping Rendt's authority. Counsel for both contestants impressed on the court the importance of an immediate decision and it was indicated that the question may be decided in time for the meeting of the county committee which is scheduled for tomorrow night.

Should the court reserve decision, however, it is probable that a bitter clash will enliven the meeting, because it will be the first time that both factions will have met since the Borough President was elected chairman by a majority of the committee last Monday. The Rendt adherents remained away from that meeting in an attempt to prevent a quorum from being present. The leaders of both factions called the forthcoming meeting, which is to be held at Democratic headquarters in Stapleton, S. I.

Rendt First to Obtain Order.

Alfred V. Norton, who appeared in behalf of Mr. Rendt, was the first to obtain an order yesterday. He informed the court that Rendt was duly elected County Chairman in 1920 and successively again at the expiration of each term since then, and that his present term does not expire until 1931. He contended that Rendt was illegally deposed because the special meeting which resulted in his being ousted was called by the borough chief for the purpose, ostensibly, of amending certain by-laws, and that it had no authority to take up other matters. The attorney insisted that Rendt is still chairman of the organization and has a legal right to the committee's records.

Counsel for the Borough President argued that he was duly elected chairman by a majority of the committee at a local meeting and that Rendt should be compelled to surrender the books, accounts, records and other appurtenances of the office.

The breach between the Borough President and the Commissioner of Public Works began several months ago, but did not become an open break until June 7, when Rendt ousted two of the Lynch supporters from the Democratic executive committee. They were Edward Atwell, secretary to the Borough President, and Robert Lindsay, former secretary to Park Commissioner John J. O'Rourke.

Old Differences Recalled.

The immediate cause of the ousting seems to have resulted from criticism by Lindsay of the action of Park Commissioner O'Rourke in leasing Crooke's Point to J. W. Cronan for $1,000 a month for eight months. The property had been acquired by the city for a marine park. But prior to that there had been bad blood between Lynch and Rendt which is supposed to have existed since the Walker-Hylan campaign.

The meeting last Monday was attended by 350 committee members, of which about one-third were women. There are 617 members on the committee, but the Rendt supporters stayed away. Those present voted unanimously, and before taking up the matter of the chairmanship adopted two resolutions designed to comply with the State statutes governing such meetings.

It was generally believed that the court action was brought only as a last resort, when all hope of settlement by Tammany Hall had dwindled. John A. Curry, leader of Tammany Hall, invited both contestants to his office several weeks ago in an attempt to induce them to iron out their differences themselves. They were unable to effect a reconciliation, however, and Tammany Hall thereafter remained in the background, apparently content to allow the two leaders to fight it out themselves.

CAR TURNS OVER ON THREE.

New Yorker Fatally Injured, Two Girls Hurt, Near Kingston, N. Y.

Special to The New York Times.

KINGSTON, N. Y., July 26.—Charles Elster of 615 West 148th Street, New York City, was fatally injured and Lisa and Eugenia Repelski were cut and bruised on their heads and bodies when an auto Elster was driving struck an obstruction at the foot of a long hill in front of the Payne estate at Esopus and turned over. Mr. Elster was conveying the sisters to Woodstock to visit their mother, who is stopping at one of the Summer boarding houses. They are in the Kingston Hospital, but their condition is not considered serious.

tinued Mr. Allen. "It is of gold and not talk. Its business is digging gold and not selling stock. In its short time of operation it has sold one car at $110 a ton, another at $79 a ton and bullion from ore mined and milled.

"Its working faces, when work was suspended pending purchase of cyanide machinery, were sampled by an outside mining engineer and assayed by the University of Arizona Mining College; the average was $32.20. The ore body taken ruthlessly as the outside mining engineer paced off the places, averaged $14.07 when widths were weighed and $13 unweighed. Ore actually milled has run nearer $20, which was the average used when we all bought in.

"The complainant in this case lost heavily, she claimed, in the stock market last Fall. Her mine stock gave her shares in twice the ore she bought into. Her other money was lost. Yet she seemed to feel that some one should give her back her mine money. She never asked me for it, but has gone to the District Attorney with statements that are so clearly misstatements of easily obtainable records that it is amazing the District Attorney should credit them. She got what she bought, $2,000 worth of basic gold property. She didn't get what she seems to have wanted, shares in a company that never was formed.

"The 'world by the tail' reference was used by me in one of my informal notes to personal friends, who were already in the mine, to quote a conservative man's caution against believing any mine story until we got the proof. The facts about the ups and downs were told frankly because we were all a small group of friends who knew one another. Culling disparagement from these two-sided reports was unprofessional for a reporter or a District Attorney.

Defends Value of Mine.

"The mine is a valuable property. I put everything I had into it, besides time and expense money. Thus far I have not had a cent from it. That is not strange for a new venture, starting less than a year ago. I believe that anyone examining the facts will expect all the investors to reap a big harvest.

"If my explaining the facts helps expose the 'grand jury racket' that is attempted against me, not because I am an officer of the mine, but because I am a fact finder respecting city spending and city work, I shall consider it a very great public service."

Dr. Allen explained that when he identified himself with the gold mine venture it had been proposed by those interested in it to organize La Palma Mining Company as a holding corporation. It was found, however, he said, that a corporation already had been incorporated in Arizona under that name, and then it was proposed to call the holding company the Luisa Mining Corporation.

He dissuaded the others from forming any holding corporation, he said, at a conference in Tucson. In the meantime, he added, Easton Shaw of 270 Broadway, who resigned as secretary of La Verdina Company about a year ago, had been selling stock of La Palma Corporation in the belief it would be the holding company.

Dr. Allen admitted that, in a recent letter to the Mines Handbook, Inc., 17 John Street, which prints an authoritative directory on mines, he declared he knew of no La Palma Mining Company. "I had forgotten all about its being intended as the original holding company," he said, "but when my attention was called to the matter I immediately sent them all the information I had on the matter."

Dr. Allen explained that Andrew Brady of Tucson was elected president of La Verdina Company because of his experience in Pennsylvania in blast furnace work and coal mining operations. The vice president, A. N. Farmer of Cleveland, he added, is a school surveyor. Mr. Allen became secretary-treasurer of the gold mining company when Mr. Shaw resigned.

Describes Woman's Purchase.

"My brother accepted the $2,000 from Miss Cotterill for Mr. Shaw," Dr. Allen explained. "About $170,000 has been invested in the venture. Of this about $80,000 was turned in by Mr. Shaw from sales of stock in the company. He sold about $97,000 in stock and could have turned in only $40,000 of it, but he was so impressed with the possibilities of the gold mine that he gave twice what he should have given."

It was understood that the grand jury investigation dwelt mainly on the receipt of the $2,000 by Dr. Allen's brother from Miss Cotterill. He was present yesterday when Dr. Allen made his statement and admitted that he had accepted the money and had given her the La Palma receipt, to which was signed his name as well as that of Mr. Shaw.

He also admitted that he had made a statement to the investigator from the Better Business Bureau in connection with the financing of the gold mine, adding that he went down the hall to tell the bureau about it.

Both he and Dr. Allen explained that Miss Cotterill was employed about a year ago in Dr. Allen's office for about a week. She had come to Dr. Allen's office in November, 1928, to purchase the gold mine stock through the interest of her employer, who formerly had been connected with Dr. Allen in research work, they said.

"There were thirty-three of my friends in the group that invested in the gold mine," said Dr. Allen. "She never said anything here about being dissatisfied with the purchase of the stock. Instead she goes down the hall and tells the Better Business Bureau about it. The thing that strikes me as peculiar is that the Better Business Bureau, although right at my elbow, never came in here to ask me about the stock transaction with Miss Cotterill."

Dr. Allen said that if Assistant District Attorney McNaboe would send for him he would waive immunity to testify before the grand jury tomorrow.

HENNESSEY GIVES UP, AND IS FREED IN BAIL

Fach Says the Former Public Administrator Took Funds to Cover Up Account Shortage.

RICARD ESTATE INVOLVED

Official Says Amount Gone From It Is About $35,000—Accused Man Says He Will Talk Wednesday.

James W. Hennessey, former Public Administrator of Richmond County, whose resignation was forced last Friday because of a $40,000 shortage in his accounts, which resulted in two indictments for second-degree grand larceny, was released in $5,000 bail yesterday by County Judge Thomas F. Cosgrove.

Though Judge Cosgrove had issued a bench warrant for the former official, Hennessey gave himself up voluntarily to District Attorney Fach yesterday morning. He will plead to the indictments on Wednesday. Mr. Fach hinted that other indictments might follow a check-up of the accounts in estates outside Hennessey's jurisdiction. This investigation is now being made and it will be impossible to fix the exact amount of Hennessey's shortage until it has been completed. Additional evidence will be presented to the grand jury when it meets on Wednesday, Mr. Fach said.

Ricard Estate Involved.

While Mr. Fach would not reveal the estates suffering losses under Hennessey's administration, he disclosed that the largest loss came from the estate of William Ricard, to which Hennessey had been appointed temporary administrator in his private capacity, not as Public Administrator. Mr. Ricard was a retired business man of Port Richmond and was known as a horse fancier. He died on Sept. 28, 1928, and left an estate of about $350,000.

His will left the entire estate to John G. Jenkins of Brooklyn, an intimate friend, and cut off his two sisters, Mrs. Elizabeth Foggin and Mrs. Elinor Van Name. Mr. Jenkins was named executor. Early this year the sisters contested the will in Richmond County Surrogate's Court on the ground that their brother was mentally incompetent at the time it was made. Jenkins opposed the suit, and after a six-weeks trial a compromise settlement was reached. Hennessey was appointed temporary administrator several weeks after Ricard died by C. Harry Tiernan, then Surrogate and County Judge.

James W. Burke, counsel for the two sisters, said that Hennessey had been required to put up a $25,000 bond. If there were any losses, Mr. Burke said, they would have to be borne by Mr. Jenkins, since his clients received their share of the estate under the compromise agreement.

Charges Move to "Cover Up."

Funds from this estate, according to Mr. Fach, were used by Hennessey to cover up shortages in the public administrator's office. He termed the process "robbing Peter to pay Paul." As public administrator, Hennessey was bonded for $5,000. If his shortages do not exceed $40,000, the actual loss to the estates will not be more than $35,000. It is understood that the $35,000, or an amount close to it, came from the Ricard estate, though the exact amount will not be known until the audit now being made is finished.

Hennessey continued his silence yesterday, refusing to discuss the case. He said he would issue a statement after he appeared in court on Wednesday.

VAUSE AID EXPECTED IN PIER LEASE CASE

Tuttle Indicates Ex-Judge May Escape Perjury Trial if He Tells About Payments.

THANKS CRAIN FOR HELP

Trials of Doyle and Ewald to Begin Soon, He Promises—Shongood Verdict This Week.

Former Kings County Judge W. Bernard Vause, who faces a maximum penalty of sixty-two years in Atlanta Penitentiary under his conviction Friday on thirteen counts for mail fraud, may not have to stand trial on an additional indictment charging perjury before the Federal grand jury, United States Attorney Tuttle indicated yesterday.

Mr. Tuttle said that the perjury indictment was still pending, but he did not say whether it would be called for trial. It was said at the Federal Building that the convicted judge would "receive consideration" if he told what he knew about payments he is accused of having received from the United American Lines in connection with the granting of North River pier leases.

It was the former judge's testimony concerning these payments received, according to the government, before and after he went on the bench, that resulted in his indictment for perjury. Vause, Samuel Schuchman and Harry Cruso, convicted with him Friday, for mail fraud in connection with the failure of the Columbia Finance Corporation, will be sentenced Wednesday by Federal Judge Coxe.

Schuchman was the only one of the three men who passed the night in the Federal House of Detention. Cruso's bail remained at $2,500, the figure set before conviction. Vause filed a $10,000 bond through a surety company soon after the bail set for him and Schuchman had been increased to that figure. Schuchman, however, was unable to obtain a bondsman until yesterday.

In line with the possibility that Vause will not have to face a second trial, Mr. Tuttle made it known that while the Columbia Finance Corporation trial was pending he had talked with the former judge. The Federal Attorney declined to make public details of that conversation, and Nathan Perlman, Vause's attorney, said he understood that it had been confidential.

Mr. Tuttle, it was learned in the Criminal Courts Building, has written a letter to District Attorney Crain, thanking the county prosecutor for his cooperation in the prosecution of Vause.

"Now that the trial of W. Bernard Vause et al. has terminated," he wrote, "in a verdict which, in my judgment, serves in a very timely way the interests of justice, I want to thank you for permitting us to have throughout the trial the aid and association of the Hon. Thomas F. Kane, Assistant District Attorney of the county of New York. He has cooperated with us most effectively and faithfully."

The trial of William F. Doyle, veterinarian, who is accused of having accepted large fees from clients he represented before the Board of Standards and Appeals while William E. Walsh was its chairman, may get under way before the end of next week, Mr. Tuttle said.

Dr. Doyle is under indictment for having filed alleged false income tax returns for the years 1927, 1928 and 1929. Another indictment charges that he committed perjury in his returns for 1927 and 1928. Mr. Tuttle said that he would move to consolidate the two indictments.

Federal Judge Robert P. Patterson, who is presiding at the trial of Charles Shongood, former United States auctioneer; Charles Shongood Jr. and Kathryn McGough, the elder Shongood's cashier, for alleged embezzlement in 1928, probably will preside at Doyle's trial. The government is expected to rest its case tomorrow in the Shongood trial, and a verdict is expected Wednesday or Thursday.

Another trial which should be called soon is that of former Magistrate George F. Ewald and others for alleged mail fraud in connection with the sale of stock of the Cotter Butte Mines. Two out-of-town Federal judges are expected to sit here next month to take care of a heavy calendar.

GOLD STAR MOTHERS SAIL FROM HOBOKEN

Exercises at Pier in Honor of 227 From New Jersey and Pennsylvania.

A group of 227 Gold Star mothers and widows sailed for France on the United States liner Republic yesterday in charge of Major F. D. Carlock, of the Twenty-eighth Infantry. Most of the mothers were from New Jersey and Pennsylvania and many friends and relatives were at the pier in Hoboken and took part in exercises conducted by officials of Hoboken and State organizations.

Addresses were made by Mayor Bernard N. McFeeley of Hoboken, Richard S. Hartshorne, New Jersey State Commander of the American Legion; Fred L. Hauser, past commander of the Hudson County Post of the American Legion; James Clarke, the present commander and Anthony C. Vazetti of the Hudson County post.

Among the mothers sailing was Mrs. Julia Lonergan of 14 Pillop Place, West Orange, who has been an invalid since the death of her son twelve years ago. Officials conducting the tours said that when the government notified Mrs. Lonergan several months ago that she could travel to France as a Federal guest, her condition began to improve rapidly and yesterday she was able to sail with the others.

Another group of mothers and widows of soldiers buried abroad, returned to Hoboken yesterday on the United States liner America. The America reached quarantine at 10:45 P. M. on Friday night and docked at 7 o'clock yesterday morning. There were 293 mothers and widows and all were in high spirits and good health. Two of the group who became ill on the way over had recovered by the time the ship docked.

An army band and groups of American Legion Posts and Veterans of Foreign Wars were on the pier to greet the group.

NANKING PREPARES FOR DECISIVE FIGHT

Plans Major Battle on Tientsin-Pukow Railway, Seeking to End Northern Campaign.

REBELS ALSO MASS TROOPS

Americans at Pochow Reported Safe —Consul Asks Nanking to Aid Their Departure.

SHANGHAI, July 26 (AP).—The Nanking Government prepared this week-end for a fight to a finish with the Northern alliance rebels in Honan and Shantung Provinces.

Nanking dispatches from Suchow tonight said preparations for a super-battle along the Tientsin-Pukow Railway near Taian, Shantung, had been made for several days. There has been an ominous lull there and renewal of hostilities was expected momentarily as the Nanking leaders prepared to "make this battle the concluding major engagement of the anti-Northern campaign."

While Nanking continued to pour additional men and munitions northward along the Tientsin-Pukow line, Northern advices indicated the rebels were massing a huge army south of Tsinan and also east of the Shantung capital. Both sides appeared reluctant to take the offensive, remaining watchful for the enemy to move.

Recent days have brought only minor fighting on other fronts, although the Nanking forces last Tuesday claimed they had killed 5,000 rebels near Langfeng, Honan Province. This was denied in Northern circles.

Typhus Reported in Honan.

Nanking tonight said typhus had broken out in Honan Province behind the enemy lines, and also in Shensi Province among the rebels. This report lacked confirmation from other sources.

Chiang Kai-shek, President and Commander-in-Chief of the Nanking armies, has given a lengthy review of the Nationalist military operations to civilian authorities at Nanking. He expressed his unshaken determination to prosecute his campaign and his unabated confidence in final victory.

Although Nanking military forces of Kweiteh today claimed the capture of Pochow, where four American missionaries were caught within the rebel-dominated city when government troops began a bombardment, confirmation of the report failed to develop.

Local headquarters of the Southern Baptist Mission failed to receive any word from the four missionaries. It was believed some communication would have been sent had they left Pochow.

Peking advices quoted Northern militarists as denying the Nationalists had taken Pochow. The stranded missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Strowther, Dr. Mary King, and Miss Oliver Riddell, were not believed to be in danger when the bombardment started, and were reported well supplied with food.

Missionaries Stay at Posts.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—A report was received by the State Department today from John J. Muccio, American Consul at Fuchow, concerning his arrival there on Thursday from the upper Min River valley with twenty-one American missionaries who had long been marooned in the interior by the operations of Communist troops and bandits.

The missionaries were permitted to go through the lines on safe conducts arranged by Consul Muccio. A number of missionaries, however, elected to remain at their posts.

They were listed in the report as follows:

At Chungan, the Rev. W. F. Cassidy of 869 Lexington Avenue, New York City, and the Rev. John Raymond Grace of Charlestown, Mass.

At Shaowu, Dr. Childs L. Storrs of Hillsborough, N. H., and Dr. Walter H. Judd of Rising City, Neb.

These four missionaries considered it safer to remain than to try to pass through the bandit-infested area.

At Yenping, Dr. and Mrs. James E. Skinner of North Topeka, Kan., and Miss Glamour Burner (address unknown), who refused to leave, with their hospital crowded with wounded soldiers.

At Lekdu, Dr. Ruth Herway (address unknown), was too ill to travel.

All the other Americans in the Fuchow consular district were reported safe at Fuchow, while Yenping and Mintsing were said to be in no immediate danger.

Consul Walter A. Adams at Nanking reported today the receipt of advices through an American missionary at Kweiteh, saying that all Americans were safe and well at Pochow.

On account of interruption of transportation by military activity, however, Mr. Adams has requested the Nanking military authorities to facilitate the departure from Pochow of those who may desire to leave.

Thieves Get Valuables Hidden On Reichstag Library Shelves

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, July 26.—The space behind the books on the Reichstag's library shelves has been serving as secret safe deposit boxes for a number of Reichstag members and high officials who presumably had a prejudice against banks, it was discovered today.

An announcement that thieves had broken into the library last night but that apparently there were no books missing brought a number of anxious Reichstag members hurriedly to the library this afternoon, and a howl went up when it was discovered that a considerable number of valuables believed to be safe behind the tomes virtually never read had disappeared. One high official declares he has lost all the family silver and several others have apparently been equally hard hit.

TURKS READY TO MOVE ON REMAINING KURDS

500 Rebel Horsemen Attempt to Draw Attack Southward but Are Repulsed.

ISTANBUL, Turkey, July 26 (AP).—With heavy reinforcements of troops and occupation of strategic points at the base of Mount Ararat, the Turks were placed today for a strong offensive, with both infantry and cavalry, against Kurdish rebels entrenched in mountain strongholds who have survived daily airplane bombardments.

In the last two weeks the Turks have completed the devastation of a wide area south and west of Ararat, destroying hundreds of villages whose inhabitants aided the rebels. Thus the Ottomans now have cut off from their supplies the remaining forces of the incursion on the mountain.

Kurdish horsemen numbering about 500 rode out from Mossoul yesterday and attacked Horosan, in the Province of Hakkiari, hoping to draw the Turkish troops southward from Ararat. Turkish frontier forces repulsed the invasion.

An official bulletin today stated that the eastern provinces were quiet, with the sole exception of Ararat, which it was believed would be cleaned up today.

The Turkish press has switched from its accusations against Persia toward Iraq, now charging that the latter supplied the rebels with their munitions.

CAIRO HEAVILY GUARDED.

2,000 Troops on Duty in City, but Wafdists Make No Trouble.

CAIRO, Egypt, July 26 (AP).—Although the Wafdists had announced there would be no demonstration today, the authorities took the same precautions as on last Monday when violence was threatened. About 2,000 troops were distributed throughout the city.

Aside from the presence of the military Cairo wore a normal aspect with shops and other business places open as usual.

SHAW REMINISCES ON 74TH BIRTHDAY

Dramatist Recalls Some Names He Used in the Early Days Before He Was Famous.

CALLS WIFE BEST CRITIC

And She Says She Spends a Third of Her Time Looking After Her Untidy Genius.

LONDON, July 26 (AP).—George Bernard Shaw, celebrating his seventy-fourth birthday today in excellent health and spirits, recalled some of the pen-names he used in the 90s, the days before he was famous.

One of these pseudonyms, Redbarn Wash, is merely the letters in Bernard Shaw all jumbled up. Another, G. B. S. Larking, indicated the facetiousness of the author. Amelia Mackintosh, which sounds like some mild-mannered Victorian lady, was in reality the vitrolic Irish critic. The pen-name L. O. Streeter was taken from the locality in which Shaw had lodgings.

As he became reminiscent of his earlier days as an author Mr. Shaw reiterated that his best critic had always been his wife. Mrs. Shaw, whom the author married thirty-four years ago when he was past 40 years old, was Miss Charlotte Francis Payne-Townsend of County Cork. She is the sister of Lady Cholmondeley, to whom Mr. Shaw has dedicated "The Intelligent Woman's Guide to Socialism."

Mrs. Shaw is a white-haired, pleasant woman, devoted to her husband and content to hide her own pronounced literary gifts in the shadow of her husband's eminence. This amiable Irish woman, like her husband, is a Fabian and shares his intellectual socialism, but she spends much of her time looking after the tall, untidy genius in baggy clothes.

"I estimate that I spend a third of my time looking after him," she said.

When some one asked Mr. Shaw why he had married her he replied:

"Why, I married her for her money, of course."

And, sitting alongside Mrs. Shaw, a picture of perfect domestic bliss before the fireplace of their Whitehall Court apartment, he launched into a tirade against domesticity and the horrors of marriage.

Mr. Shaw was astir early today. While most Londoners were fighting the need to arise from bed he stepped briskly from his home and walked to the Royal Automobile Club for a swim.

On his way there he passed under a ladder, proving that he is not superstitious even on his birthday. At the Duke of York's monument Mr. Shaw spiritedly bounded up the steps leading from the Mall two at a time and shortly after this was enjoying his swim. He remained in the water half an hour. Mr. Shaw is more than ever the literary and dramatic emperor of Europe. He admits it himself.

The first time he had a play produced in Vienna the producers objected to his dictatorial stipulations about the manner in which the play was to be produced.

"I said to them," said Mr. Shaw, "politically your Emperor is the Emperor of Austria, but from the dramatic point of view I am the emperor of Europe."

He has never abdicated. Nor has he ceased speaking his mind.

RUMANIA TAKES STEP TO CURB ANTI-SEMITES

Gives Minister of the Interior a Free Hand to End Attacks on Jewish Population.

BUCHAREST, July 26 (AP).—The Rumanian Cabinet, after a session of seven hours, today voted to give the Minister of the Interior, Dr. Alexander Vayda Voevod, a free hand to suppress immediately attacks on the Jewish population. The emergency action was taken to check impairment of the credit of Rumania abroad and to put a stop to outbreaks in which Jews have suffered.

Officers of the Ministry of Justice were instructed to give all possible assistance in fighting anti-Semitism.

The Interior Ministry said the burning of twenty homes of Jews in Galatz last night had nothing to do with the Iron Guard [an anti-Semitic youth organization] or anti-Semitism.

Vereshty, where Jews had asked armed protection during a bazaar today, was quiet under guard of a police detachment from Galatz.

News of the arrest of Zelea Codreanu, an anti-Semitic leader, was officially given out by the Interior Department today.

BUCHAREST, July 26 (Jewish Telegraphic Agency).—Sholom Landau, a prominent Jewish leader of Bessarabia, was shot and killed today in Uriev, Bessarabia, by the former Professor Màchedon, a notorious anti-Semite. An immediate investigation has been ordered by the local officials.

38,000 STRIKERS OUT IN NORTH OF FRANCE

Workers Refuse to Pay Quota Under New Insurance Act —Firms Close Works.

BELGIAN EMPLOYES STONED

Rises in the Prices of Bread and Wine Encourage Demand for Increased Wages.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 26.—Throughout the industrial districts of Northern France during the past ten days large numbers of workers have gone on strike, refusing to pay their part of the contribution under the social insurance act, which has just come into force.

In the Rouen district there are 13,000 on strike, in the Lille district about 15,000 and among the textile workers at Armentières, 10,000. Several firms have had to close their works and in several instances there has been a disposition to riot. Some Belgian workers were stoned yesterday as they crossed the frontier to work at Roubaix, and at Béziers the Internationale was sung by a group of strikers in the public square.

In those places where the benefits of the new act have been carefully explained, the workers, it is said, show a tendency to return to work.

The increase in the price of bread and wine has also had an effect in stirring the demand for increased wages.

The Cabinet, in an effort to reduce the price of bread, or at least to prevent a further increase, today sanctioned the use of 10 per cent instead of 4 per cent of foreign flour in baking, and other measures were discussed. The situation is curious. France last year produced so large a wheat crop that the country was able to export 6,000,000 quintals, and even though this year's crop is likely to be badly damaged by the weather, the official information is that supplies will be plentiful. The present rise in price is due, it is stated, entirely to speculation encouraged by the protective measures which were designed to help the farmer and not the speculator.

The high price of wine, too, is causing dissatisfaction and is lowering consumption. Joseph Barthélemy, noted economist, wrote recently in Le Capital that while the price to the growers was 3 cents a litre, the retail price to the country was 12 cents. One large firm of wine merchants this year showed a profit of $160,000 after paying $800,000 in taxation.

PLAIN-SURFACE WOOLEN RIVALS TWEED IN PARIS

Chiffon Broadcloth Competing With Velvet in the Newest Afternoon Gowns.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 26.—There has been a week-end lull in the style offensive. Textile creators say plain-surface woolens menace the popularity of tweeds. Chiffon broadcloth competes with velvet for afternoon gowns.

Rodier moussli-duvetyn, Bianchini seersucker, crêpe satin, Veron Lajonnie crêpe satin and phosphora are being extensively bought by the leading couturiers. Wiener's sheer lamé is an evening novelty, and his sheer serge, backed with jacquard, is taken for afternoon tunics.

All-over embroidery, Lyons velvets and dull-surface satin have been revived for afternoon and evening. Jerseys have come back strong for daytime and a Rodier broadcloth finish jersey is a sensational novelty featured by many creators.

Couturiers' reservations of silks and woolens indicate the supremacy of wine and monk browns. Dark reds, ruby, garnet and amaranth come next; then navies, dark lapis and midnight blues; then dark greens, myrtlex, serpent and sage, and there are some purples. Most of the lamés are of light gold, and there are signs of a silver revival.

CHITTAGONG TRIAL OPENS.

Thirty-two Bengalis Charged With Attack on Arsenal in India.

CHITTAGONG, India, July 26 (AP).—Ananta Singh and thirty-one other Bengals went on trial today, charged with murder and conspiracy in connection with the raid on the Chittagong police arsenal in April.

The prosecution traced the history of what it described as a revolutionary movement and said the conspirators' plans included a determination to murder the members of the local European Club.

CALCUTTA, July 26 (AP).—Sixty women civil disobedience volunteers, refused permission to parade yesterday afternoon, sat down on the pavement at 5 P. M., following out Mahatma Gandhi's preachment of non-resistance. There they sat all last night and today.

The police stood by all the while.

M'DONALD TO MISS LEAGUE ASSEMBLY

Henderson to Head British in September, With Premier Due to Go to Canada.

SOME CIRCLES PLEASED

Others Regret the Prime Minister Won't Push Naval Negotiations—Henderson, Ill, to Rest First.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, July 26.—Prime Minister MacDonald, it is unofficially learned here, is not coming to the League of Nations Assembly in September. His presence had been expected because it was thought he would personally report to the League members on the London naval arms conference, which his speech here at the last Assembly foreshadowed. It is understood he is going to Canada in September, leaving Arthur Henderson, the Foreign Secretary, to head the British Assembly delegation, unless plans are changed.

It is noteworthy that some League circles are not displeased by today's official announcement that Mr. Henderson will head the delegation, for they believe that he is a much stronger supporter of the League than Mr. MacDonald, who has undoubtedly lost many friends here during the past year. Indeed, there is a tendency here to regard Mr. Henderson as the coming man in the Labor party.

Others Disappointed.

Others, however, are disappointed and surprised, for they had hoped Mr. MacDonald would not lose the opportunity of presence at the Assembly to push the Franco-Italian naval negotiations, which are to be resumed then. There is some speculation as to whether Mr. MacDonald has planned his absence because of likelihood of criticism developing here over his attitude toward the League during his sanction talks with the French at the London conference, which raised considerable doubt about how far the British could be depended on to carry out the obligations of the covenant to enforce peace.

Much satisfaction, on the other hand, is being expressed at the news that two British dominion Premiers, J. B. M. Hertzog of the Union of South Africa and J. H. Scullin of Australia, will head their Assembly delegations, for the attendance of overseas Premiers is rare. Because of the Imperial Conference in London in October it is believed that other British dominions will also send their Premiers to Geneva for this Assembly.

The European States which have thus far announced their delegations—Belgium, Denmark, Switzerland and Sweden—are all sending their Foreign Ministers, while the Japanese will be headed for the first time at the Assembly by Tsuneo Matsudaira, Ambassador at London, who was one of the most influential delegates at the naval conference.

Henderson Is Ill.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 26.—The Foreign Secretary, Arthur Henderson, is ill and intends to enter a nursing home for rest and treatment before going to represent Britain at the League Assembly.

Ever sice the Labor Government came into office Mr. Henderson has carried enormous responsibilities, chiefly at the Foreign Office but also as organizer of the Labor Party. His burden has been increased more than ever by the recent breakdown of the negotiations with Egypt and the riots at Alexandria.

Mr. Henderson's illness is said to be not at all alarming, but he is taking it seriously and voluntarily cutting himself off from all immediate work to recuperate.

MEXICAN OFFICER HELD IN AIR CRASH INQUIRY

Cadets Demand to Know Whether Colonel Was Aware of Bet Blamed for Five Deaths.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, July 26.—Following the deaths of four Mexican military aviators and a civilian yesterday after the collision of two planes in aerial manoeuvres, Colonel Alfred Lezama, commanding the First Air Regiment, has been placed under arrest and lodged in Santiago Military Prison on instructions from the Minister of War. He will remain at Santiago until the conclusion of an inquiry by a military court as to the responsibility for the accident.

It has been charged that Colonel Lezama endangered the lives of young pilots by allowing them to introduce a dinner bet into their military manoeuvres, and the cadets have demanded an inquiry. Another point which may be urged against him is that he allowed manoeuvres by officers insufficiently experienced in handling such heavy machines as the Douglas.

The bodies of those killed until late this afternoon lay in state in Emilio Carranza hangar, their burial this morning as proposed being impossible, due to legal formalities. Throughout the night a guard of aviation officers, headed by General Caloca, stood over them. The hangar was filled with floral offerings.

Colonel Lezama succeeded to his present post on the death of Colonel Pablo Sidar, whose plane fell into the Pacific. He received his flying training in the United States.

Colombian Minister Leaves Lima.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LIMA, Peru, July 26.—Dr. Fabio Lozano, for ten years Colombian Minister at Lima, who is regarded as mainly responsible for the settlement of the long-standing Peru-Colombia boundary dispute, will leave today for Bogota. It is believed Dr. Lozano is to occupy the Foreign Relations post in the Cabinet of President-elect Olaya Herrera.

Congratulates Andean Climbers.

BUENOS AIRES, July 26 (AP).—The Minister of War today congratulated the two lieutenants and two corporals who recently climbed Mount Aconcagua, tallest peak of the Andes. After great suffering the men reached an altitude of 22,070 feet. Aconcagua is 23,080 feet high.

M'DONALD DEFENDS LABORITE RECORD

Calls Naval Treaty "Tremendous Step" and Asks Patience on Unachieved Party Aims.

BALDWIN FORESEES DEFEAT

Predicts Government's Overthrow Within Six Months—Warns Labor Not to Rely on "World Causes."

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 26.—While his predecessor, Stanley Baldwin, was warning his followers of a general election within six months, Premier MacDonald was defending the Labor Government's record tonight, especially in the fields of agriculture, widows' pensions and disarmament.

The speeches by both leaders were their last party pronouncements outside Parliament before the end of the present House of Commons session, which comes next Friday. Both, consequently, tried to make their speeches a summing-up of their policies and Mr. MacDonald made his a review of the Labor party's record in its first fifteen months.

"We are coming to the end of the session with our aims not quite so full of achievement as we should like," said the Prime Minister, speaking at Buckhurst Park, Kent. "You will just have to exercise the same patience as we are exercising."

Only once, in fact, was the Premier enthusiastic over his own government's accomplishments and that was when he called the London naval treaty a "tremendous step" toward disarmament.

"It is easy to sit down at a Labor meeting and pass resolutions on disarmament and so on," he declared, "but when you meet in conference representatives of nations as independent as you are, nations who have an inherited tradition as a result of generations of experience of invasion and destruction, you cannot easily wipe out those traditions. You will have to rely upon the philosophy, 'Not as I will, but as they will.' That is the problem we have been up against in the past twelve months.

"They tell you we have to spend money in building up new ships. Of course we have, but the first step in disarmament is to end competition and I say now as I said in the House of Commons some years ago that if I can end competition, even if it is necessary to build more ships for the time being I will do so.

"We have proved that all the great means of mass destruction—guns, ships, poison gas—have never given us security. What we have to do is to change the nature of the weapons of security, transfer them from the material things which kill and replace them with the intellectual and moral things which secure justice."

Mr. Baldwin, who addressed 5,000 Conservatives at Brighouse, Yorkshire, did not mention the naval treaty but warned the Laborites they could not fall back on "world causes" to aevrt the voters' wrath.

"There are no more world causes today than when we were in office," Mr. Baldwin asserted. "We had to deal with troubles in China and a boycott in India, just as well as the present government. But they squeal a good deal louder than we did. That is perhaps why you hear them better."

Mr. Baldwin recalled the prediction of Philip Snowden, Chancellor of the Exchequer, that there would be a marked improvement in industry in six months.

"I hope there will," Mr. Baldwin retorted, "because I don't think he will be in office then."

The Conservative leader repeated his advocacy of tariff "safeguards" and suggested a new body of paid representatives of the Dominions and the mother country to work permanently at the economic and industrial problems of the British Empire.

MEXICO WILL ACT IN SILVER CRISIS

To Allow Cuts in Staffs, Pay and Working Hours Without Recourse to Arbitration.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, July 26.—The Ortiz Rubio Administration is on the point of issuing a decree allowing mining concerns throughout the republic to readjust their working staffs, salaries and working hours without the lengthy and troublesome exchanges which have arisen from the necessity of consulting conciliation and arbitration boards.

This measure arises from appreciation on the part of the Secretary of Industry, Commerce and Labor, Señor Leon, that the mining crisis due basically to the drop in the price of bar silver is in danger of causing a general stoppage in the country's main industry. It will be an unprecedented step on the part of the government with respect to consideration for capitalistic elements which for many months past have been at a loss to find a solution.

The official notice issued today anticipating the executive decree states substantially:

"In view of the extraordinary drop in the price of silver, the mining corporations consider it most urgent, if disaster is to be avoided, to reduce production until the prevailing crisis disappears. But as such action would involve the necessity of the dismissal of workmen and the lessening of salaries and working hours, such actions only being permitted after embarrassing proceedings before labor tribunals, the intervention of the Ministry of Industry, Commerce and Labor has been petitioned to do all possible to mitigate the rigors of such proceedings.

"If total stoppages were resolved, the national economic situation and the situation of the workmen would be infinitely worse. Therefore this Ministry, realizing the gravity of the situation and on the basis of equity, considers it convenient and necessary that readjustments by the mining interests be allowed without any previous authoriziation, but always paying strict attention to labor contracts. Federal labor inspectors will be charged with the duty of watching the last-mentioned point.

"In the future companies prior to readjustments will have to give thirty days' notice. They will pay the laborers affected fifteen days' wages, except those with less than one year's service. The readjustments must not affect more than 50 per cent of the laborers, and if so doing recourse must be had to arbitration boards. Efforts will be made to incur the least number of dismissals of men and to find a temporary solution rather by a pro rata decrease in the number of working days weekly or in daily working hours."

It is believed the new decree will go far toward the solution of what was threatening to be a general stoppage of mining.

HINDENBURG DECREES FINANCIAL PROGRAM

Promulgates Bruening Cabinet's Measures Under Article 48 With Reichstag Dissolved.

PLAN MADE MORE DRASTIC

$40,000,000 Struck From the Budget, With 5% Income Tax Rise and 10 for Bachelors.

CONTROL OF CARTELS FIXED

Government May Bar Trusts or Even Break Up Groups—Limits Its Unemployment Insurance Share.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, July 26.—Taxation without representation became a fact in Germany today when the Bruening Government and President von Hindenburg promulgated the former's financial program by decree under Article 48 of the Constitution. It is hoped to meet the budget deficit and place the public finances upon a sound footing.

The program which was announced tonight differs somewhat from that presented to the Reichstag before the latter's dissolution in that it is more drastic than the one for which it proved impossible to obtain a majority. Today's measures represent the government's first tangible attempt to fulfill the program under which it took office in April and are the climax to more than three months of fruitless effort to meet all the demands presented by the various Reichstag parties. It is also the first time Article 48 has been used for financial bills.

The new law, which fills more than forty pages of the law book and is entitled "a decree for clearing up the financial, economic and social state of emergency," provides for striking out $40,000,000 from the budget, raising the unemployment insurance premium from 1 per cent to 4½, the imposition of a 5 per cent increase in the income tax and a 10 per cent increase for bachelors, and a special additional 2½ per cent "sacrifice tax" to be levied upon all civil servants.

Another feature is the granting of permission to communes to levy an increased beer tax and a head tax. A portion of the measures planned for agricultural relief in the Eastern provinces is also included.

A significant provision of the new law empowers the government to refuse to ratify cartel agreements and even to dissolve cartels if the latter fail to achieve a revision of prices downward in keeping with the general economic trend.

It will be recalled that some weeks ago informal negotiations between industrialists and the trade unions with a view to attaining uniform price and wage reductions became deadlocked and were turned over to the Federal Economic Council. The government now declares that under certain circumstances when negotiations between industrial cartels and the Economic Council fail to reach tangible results, a cartel may be disbanded and competition again allowed to reign.

The Minister of Finance, Dr. Dietrich, tonight explained that the measures would become operative on Sept. 1 and estimated that the loss of income of about $6,000,000 through inability to begin on Aug. 1 would be met through a further paring down of disbursements without new taxes.

A further important change in previous policy is found in the provision that the government will no longer make up whatever deficit the unemployment insurance funds incur, but will provide a set amount and thereafter will only contribute half of what is lacking, requiring the insurance administration to make up the remainder through increased premiums or, conversely, to reduce the amount of insurance granted.

The government expects to contribute $163,000,000 in the coming year to unemployment insurance, realizing that the previous average of 1,600,000 unemployed throughout the year will be exceeded, but notice has now been served that the government cannot be counted on to add endlessly to this amount.

$100,000 FOR ROCKET TEST.

Daniel Guggenheim Assures Backing for Goddard's Experiments.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

CARLSBAD, Czechoslovakia, July 26.—The sum with which Daniel Guggenheim is prepared to back the experiments carried on for the last seven years by Professor Goddard of Clark University of Worcester, Mass., to explore the atmosphere at extreme altitudes by means of rockets is $100,000, Mr. Guggenheim told this correspondent today.

Mr. Guggenheim, who arrived in Carlsbad, said: "After investigating the matter and securing information from scientists well qualified to pass on the possibilities of a study of the atmosphere by means of rockets, I am convinced the experiments deserve support."

TO START ACROSS SEA ALONE IN HIS SLOOP

Dr. Franceschi Will Leave Spain for Porto Rico Today—He Was Tired After Trip From Here.

CADIZ, Spain, July 26 (AP).—A lone sailor will leave this port tomorrow aboard a small sloop bound for Porto Rico by way of the Canary Islands. The sailor is Dr. Francisco Franceschi Caballero, a native of Porto Rico, who is planning to leave here at 11 A. M. on his long transatlantic voyage.

He expects to complete his trip in forty days. His only companion will be a large greyhound, which was presented to him recently by a dog fancier of this city. Dr. Franceschi says this trip will be attempted in only one stage, and that he is taking with him enough water and foodstuffs for a year.

Dr. Franceschi sailed from Porto Rico in his small yacht Mary more than a year ago. His companion from San Juan to New York was a sailor named Angel Carbo.

After staying in New York several weeks, the Mary set to sea once more, bound for Spain.

Franceschi wanted to touch on the historic Puerto de Palos, whence Christopher Columbus is said to have sailed on his voyage of discovery to America.

Upon the arrival of the Mary in Spain it was discovered that a wealthy New York business man named Roberto Lopez had made the trip as a stowaway on the yacht. The sailor Angel Carbo had mysteriously disappeared, and both Dr. Franceschi and Mr. Lopez were arrested by the Spanish authorities, charged with the murder of Carbo. After an investigation, Lopez was liberated.

Dr. Franceschi, however, was held for trial. He alleged that he killed Carbo in self defense, and after several months a Spanish court acquitted him. His acquittal was celebrated throughout Spain.

Dr. Franceschi remained in Spain and exhibited his yacht in the Seville Spanish-American exposition which ended in April this year.

His boat is a 36-foot sloop provided with a gasoline motor and auxiliary sails.

During his stay in Spain, Dr. Franceschi has attended lectures in the School of Medicine at the University of Madrid. He has also inspected several clinics in Spain, which he has generously praised.

On his return trip Dr. Franceschi will take the Canary Islands route but will not stop there.

AGED FRENCH PRINCESS WINS RIGHT TO MARRY

Court Rules Duke de Brissac Cannot Prevent Aunt, 73, Wedding 42-Year-Old Spaniard.

PARIS, July 26 (AP).—Princess Amedee de Broglie, aged 73, has temporarily won the right to marry Don Luis de Bourbon, aged 42, a disowned cousin of King Alfonso of Spain and son of the Infanta Eulalia.

The Tribunal of the Seine today decided that the Princess's nephew, the Duke de Brissac, had no right under French law to seek to prevent the marriage. The right to bring such a suit, the court held, belongs only to ancestral relatives and not to descendants.

Before finally deciding, however, whether a guardian should be appointed for the aged Princess, as asked by her family represented through the Duke, the court appointed three physicians to make a thorough examination of the defendant. Meanwhile, the administrator appointed by the court on July 7 is to remain in charge of the business affairs of Amedee de Broglie.

The Princess's lawyer, Henri Torres, had raised the point that French law does not recognize the right of descendants to act in family matters and had pleaded for his client to be granted the same right that is possessed by others, namely, to seek happiness wherever she sees it, no matter what her age.

Mâitre Ausepin, who defended the family interests, had pleaded that the Princess was mentally unsound.

The Princess, in a statement read by her attorney, declared, "I want to spend a few happy years before I die."

R-100 RETURNS SAFELY AFTER 1,200-MILE TRIP

Ready for Transatlantic Flight if No Defects Are Found, Commander Says.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 26.—The giant dirigible R-100 is safe in its shed at Cardington, Bedfordshire, tonight after a 1,200-mile cruise in preparation for its approaching flight to Canada. Thick weather with heavy rain clouds made flying conditions difficult, but Major G. H. Scott, the commander, said the cruise had been a success in every way.

The R-100 will undergo a thorough inspection tomorrow and if no defects are found it will be reported to the Air Ministry as ready for its first transatlantic voyage.

OTTAWA, Ont., July 26 (Canadian Press).—The British dirigible R-100 will leave England for Canada as soon after tomorrow as moderately favorable weather prevails across the Atlantic. This information was received today by the Department of National Defense from its representative in London.

The tests of the airship are expected to be completed tomorrow and the craft will then be ready to start for Montreal.

Test Flights for DO-X This Week.

FRIEDRICHSHAFEN, Germany, July 26 (AP).—The installation of American motors in the Do-X has been completed and the great Dornier twelve-motored flying boat will begin trial flights next week. The first flight probably will be on Tuesday or Wednesday. If the tests are successful the big ship probably will attempt a flight to the United States. The new motors are of the Curtiss 625-horsepower type.

TRUE EIGHT YEARS AGO
. . . just as true today!

This advertisement originally appeared in the New York newspapers on June 21, 1922.

I—am Style!

They call me Style—and in me you find interest—so here is my brief character:

A leader always, I, dissatisfied, morose, until the spark of inspiration comes—and then, aflame with images of Beauty whom I love, and straining to evade Monotony, my foe, I am recognized and seized by clamoring and enthusiastic throngs who rush to acclaim me Queen of Queens—for I am Style!

Then treacherous Mimicry copies me. My glitter fades—Monotony creeps in—and still again I change. my form, my color or my race . . for Beauty, too, has changed her mode—the Beauty that I loved . . . she now is commonplace!

A complex character mine—ever lost within itself—changing always—new but never new. Few know me well. Few can tell the guise I next shall take—but among those few, as everybody knows, is one who understands my ways so well, that I am sometimes lost to know whether I sway his deft slippers or he mine! What matters which? Beautiful, they are, and new—and I must needs accept my cue from Beauty and Originality!

THREE SCIENTISTS PRODUCE TRACHOMA

Dr. Olitsky of New York Tells Geneva Parley of Creation in Men's and Monkeys' Eyes.

ISOLATION OF GERM IS GOAL

First Meeting of the Anti-Trachoma League Hears Disease Takes 90 Per Cent Toll in Near East.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, July 26.—Hope of isolating the trachoma germ, which has defied the world since the disease was first recorded by the Egyptians in 1500 B. C., was given to the Anti-Trachoma League at a meeting in the League of Nations Secretariat Building here this afternoon by Dr. P. K. Olitsky of the Rockefeller Institute of New York, who delivered the main address.

He announced that the only woman present, Miss Sicher-Ascher, bacteriologist of Prague, and he himself had separately succeeded in producing trachoma in monkeys' eyes, and Professor Addario of Palermo, Italy, had succeeded in producing the same disease in men's eyes.

The announcement means that the death of Hideyo Noguchi, Japanese savant of the Rochefeller Institute, on the west coast of Africa in 1928 has not delayed the fight against trachoma as much as was then feared. A short time before his death Mr. Noguchi had succeeded in artificially giving monkeys trachoma, the first step toward isolating the germ. Not expecting death, he left only incomplete notes, so that the method he used remained a mystery.

A report recently made by the League of Nations health organization on trachoma, placed before the meeting, shows trachoma is one of the most widespread diseases in the world. In some countries, such as Egypt and Palestine, the sight of 90 per cent of the population is affected, the diseases's ravages being very serious all around the Mediterranean and also in the Far East. In the United States it is worst in the Appalachians and Ozarks and among the Indians.

Today's meeting was the first the Anti-Trachoma League has held since it was organized on paper at the International Ophthalmological Congress at Amsterdam last year. The session was devoted chiefly to adopting a constitution and other details. Other Americans attending are Dr. S. Friedenwald of Baltimore and Dr. Park Lewis of Buffalo, the latter vice president of the American Society for the Prevention of Blindness.

KILLS SELF IN ASH CAN TO AVOID BEING TRIED

New London Market Owner Takes Gas Following Arrest on Liquor Charge.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW LONDON, Conn., July 26.—John Kaneen, 65 years old, one of the city's oldest market men, committed suicide in an ash can today rather than go on trial on a charge of violating the prohibition laws.

After his arrest on July 17, when Federal agents assisted by the local police raided his meat market, Kaneen repeatedly told friends that they would never see him before a court of law.

After locking the front door of his market he went into a rear room, bored a hole in the bottom of an ash can and inserted a rubber tube from a wall gas jet into the hole. He then turned on the gas and crawled into the barrel, pulling an old coat and a butcher's apron down over the open end.

Mr. Kaneen was barely alive when he was found. An attempt to save his life by pulmotors proved futile. He was not married.

BROOKLYN TEACHER KILLED ON WEST COAST

Mrs. Z. H. Wooding Dies in Crash With Seattle Auto—Her Husband Gravely Injured.

Special to The New York Times.

SEATTLE, Wash., July 26.—Mrs. Z. H. Wooding, 28-year-old schoolteacher of Brooklyn, N. Y., was killed and her husband, also a schoolteacher, was seriously injured this afternoon in an automobile accident near Kelso in the southern part of the State.

The car in which the Woodings were riding, driven by R. W. Schuber of Brooklyn, was in collision with another driven by Mrs. Mollie M. Baker of Seattle. Mrs. Baker was held, pending an inquest.

NEW CHILEAN FINANCE HEAD

Julio Philippi to Become Minister on Aug. 5.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SANTIAGO, Chile, July 26.—On Aug. 5 Chile's Ministry of Finance will be taken over by Julio Philippi, at present Superintendent of Banks and a well-known financial expert. He will replace Rodolfo Jaramillo, who has resigned as Minister.

It is expected that the public statement to be made with regard to the Chilean financial situation in the first days of August will awaken unusual interest.

Publication of the figures on gold reserves abroad and also in local vaults, including 85,000,000 pesos [about $10,200,000] in rediscounts with associated banks, gives the Chilean Central Bank, which is similar in operation to the American Federal Reserve, a strong position with 90.18 per cent legal reserves, against a total of approximately 322,000,000 pesos in paper money in circulation today.

GINGER 'JAKE' VICTIMS REACH 1,100 IN KANSAS

Wichita Alone Has 500—Authorities Attribute Poison to Santo Domingo Root.

Special to The New York Times.

WICHITA, Kan., July 26.—State medical authorities report that there are 1,100 ginger "jake" paralytics in the State, 500 of whom are in Wichita alone, and as yet no cure is known to medical science.

Doctors and the chemists are still searching for the causes and a remedy for the malady, which, according to the Prohibition Bureau, has deprived about 15,000 persons in the nation of the use of their legs, arms and feet. There are said to be 600 victims in Oklahoma City.

In Topeka a few days ago the Federal grand jury indicted 197 persons in connection with the sale of the ginger. The jury is to return next week for further investigation. The laboratory experts are working on the theory that the alcohol used in the ginger which produced the "jake legs" was re-distilled industrial alcohol, and that in the re-distilling some of the poisons prescribed by the Federal denaturant formulas were left.

The Wichita health authorities take the view, however, that the poison was in the ginger root and not in the alcohol. Dr. R. E. Hobbs, head of the City Health Department, after many tests, holds the theory that there has come into common use a root from Santo Domingo similar to the real ginger root but having paralyzing effects.

LOWER CALIFORNIA.

No Recommendation for Purchase Made in Water Commission Report.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Rumors recently current in Congressional circles that the American section of the International Water Commission of the United States and Mexico, in its report to Congress on its studies of boundary waters, had recommended the purchase by the United States of Lower California were denied by the State Department today.

"The report of the International Water Commission," William R. Castle Jr., Acting Secretary of State, said, "was made to Congress last April and did not contain any reference whatever to the purchase of Lower California. No man with authority to speak for the government has ever suggested the matter."

The report has not yet been made public but is in the hands of the public printer and is expected to be given out in a few weeks. The members of the American section have resigned in the meantime, considering their work finished.

Motor Carrier Regulation Upheld.

ATLANTA, Ga., July 26 (AP).—The Georgia Supreme Court upheld the right of the State Public Service Commission to regulate motor carriers today. The decision declared the Fulton Superior Court in error in granting an injunction to the Saye M. Davis Transfer Company to prevent regulation. The Supreme Court held that the motor carrier act of Georgia was not unconstitutional, as declared by the petitioner, and that it was unnecessary to determine whether a carrier was a private or common servant.

STEUART DEFENDS EMPLOYMENT CHECK

Census Chief, Replying to Miss Perkins, Says Federal Count Was on 'Only Positive' Basis.

ACTUAL WORKERS UNKNOWN

Director Calls State Official's Objection to Total Population Ratio "Small Criticism."

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Replying to charges made by Miss Frances Perkins, State Industrial Commissioner of New York, that "a more accurate count" would reveal a greater percentage of unemployment than the Federal figures indicate, William M. Steuart, Director of the Bureau of Census, stated today that in determining the extent of idleness the bureau had used the only "positive" method available for the purpose.

Miss Perkins, in taking issue with the figures and percentages made by Leo V. Doherty, chief census supervisor for Brooklyn, declared that a true survey of conditions in Brooklyn would reveal 8 per cent of the working population to be unemployed instead of only 3 per cent, as indicated by census supervisors. She contended that because the percentage was based on the total population, rather than on the actual number of workers, it was inaccurate.

Commenting on the criticism against comparing unemployment with the total population rather than with those actually working, Mr. Steuart said:

"It would be impossible to determine exactly the number of persons actually working in Brooklyn; no one knows the amount, it can only be estimated roughly, and what we want are the exact figures, and we get them. The number of actual workers is an unknown factor, and the only known factor is the total population."

Repeating her challenge that the Bureau of Census have the American Statistical Association compute the basis and interpret the unemployment figures in the census, Miss Perkins said that census enumerators all over the country "were instructed not to include among the unemployed those who had been laid off with the promise of work in the future."

"It is absurd to exclude such persons from the unemployment count," she continued. "They are actually out of employment and there is no getting around that fact."

Mr. Steuart declared, however, that "it would be absurd to rely on statements of promised employment in a positive survey."

"Promises are not positive and we have used the only positive method," he said, adding that to take issue with the bureau's basis of comparison was "small criticism."

HUNT MAN IN NEW JERSEY.

Boy Scouts and Police Seek Frank Pearson, Missing a Week.

Special to The New York Times.

MORRISTOWN, N. J., July 26.—Boy Scouts, State police and a score of volunteers were searching today for Frank Pearson, 40 years old, of Jersey City, who disappeared mysteriously from his Summer home at Riverdale last Sunday and is believed to be lost in the mountains near Green Pond.

He had been in failing health for several weeks, and it was said that before his disappearance he had removed $30,000 in negotiable bonds from a safe deposit box in his Jersey City bank to his office and had made arrangements for his family to obtain money on them. It is understood he also drafted a will, disposing of the remainder of his property, a few days before he disappeared.

His coat and hat were found in his automobile at his Summer home. Friends believe he planned to end his life and took all necessary steps so that there would be no difficulty in settling his estate.

37 BRIDGE VICTIMS BURIED.

Bishop of Trier Celebrates Mass at Coblenz for Thirteen Killed.

COBLENZ, Germany, July 26 (AP).—Thirteen victims of the bridge disaster of Tuesday were buried today with a solemn mass of requiem celebrated by Bishop Bornewasser of Trier. Twenty-four others were buried in neighboring towns.

In all of the ceremonies there were expressions of sympathy for Mrs. Catherine Lawler, who is taking home the body of her 6-year-old son to Akron, Ohio. The Lawlers had been visiting the boy's grandfather in Coblenz when overtaken by the disaster which cost thirty-seven lives.

DOCTOR AND FATHER IN DOUBLE SUICIDE

Aged 54 and 82, Respectively, Each Shoots Himself in Office of Indianapolis Physician.

INDIANAPOLIS, July 26 (AP).—Dr. John O. Davis, 54, and his father, H. W. Davis, 82, ended their lives this afternoon in the physician's office in a down-town building. After investigating, the coroner said it was a double suicide.

No explanation of the tragedy was offered. The father had shot himself in the heart with an automatic pistol and the son had fired a revolver bullet into his temple.

The elder man lived in rooms adjoining the physician's office. Dr. Davis lived with his wife in a north side residence.

"I did mine," read two notes, one beside each body and in the handwriting of the respective men. Added to Dr. Davis's note was: "Forgive me, Dode," believed to have been addressed to Mrs. Davis.

TRAIL THREE, ARREST THEM

Brother Detectives Follow Youths 3 Hours and See Alleged Burglary.

The instinct of a detective to single out suspicious characters caused the appearance in Morrisania Court yesterday morning of three Bronx youths charged with burglary. They were held without bail by Magistrate McGee for hearing tomorrow. The three are Albert Volk, 20 years old, 3,802 Park Avenue; Morris Missinoff, 16, 1,910 Morris Avenue, and Stanley Resa, 19, 408 East 158th Street.

Patrolman Jerome Heaney of the Simpson Street station, a former detective, met his brother, Detective Bernard Heaney of the pickpocket squad, on his way home near 165th Street and Grant Avenue early yesterday. As they stood chatting they observed the three youths and became suspicious of them.

For more than three hours and a half the detectives shadowed the three. Then, they said, they saw Volk climb through the transom of the grocery store of M. Newmager at 715 Washington Avenue, the Bronx. When Volk climbed out of the store the three were arrested.

POLICE ASK TO USE RADIO.

Minneapolis Department Is Ready to Use Wireless Adjunct.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Authority to begin operating a police radio system was asked of the Radio Commission today by the authorities of Minneapolis. The city had been authorized to install a short-wave service and notified the commission that it is prepared to begin operation on the 2,416-kilocycle channel with 250 watts.

More than a score of cities are already operating or have authority to install police radio systems. Service usually is maintained by contacts from a transmitter at police headquarters with patrol cars equipped with short-wave receiving sets outside the range of ordinary broadcast receivers.

The Police Department of Lansing, Mich., operating a radio service, petitioned the commission today for modification of a permit to change its equipment and extend the completion date until Dec. 1.

His right arm went through the glass, and an artery was severed. Doctors reported his condition to be grave.

HAMER WINS A LAP IN THE AIR DERBY

Leads 13 Fliers Into Douglas, Ariz., in 4 Hours 15 Minutes From San Angelo, Tex.

GEHLBACH IS STILL AHEAD

Little Rock Pilot Has Two-Hour Margin for Entire Distance From Detroit.

DOUGLAS, Ariz., July 26 (AP).—Herman Hamer of Chicago led the All-American Air Derby into Douglas from San Angelo, Texas, at 12:19 P. M. today. Hamer was fourth to leave San Angelo.

Lieutenant Gehlbach of Little Rock maintained his lead in elapsed time of nearly 2 hours over his nearest competitor. His time for the 535-mile lap from San Angelo was 4:22:31, and his total elapsed time since leaving Detroit was 22:00:38.

Hamer beat Gehlbach here by nearly 7 minutes, taking 4 hours 15 minutes from San Angelo.

Hamer, reported officially out of the running after he experienced several hours' delay before reaching Houston, Texas, was announced tonight as reinstated. Lee Schoenhair, race manager accompanying the derbyists, said he had misinterpreted a telegram from Detroit after he had wired headquarters there concerning Hamer's delay.

Stub Quinby of Moline, Ill., was third with an elapsed time from Detroit of 23:51:09. His time for today's lap was 4:22:10.

Lowell Bayless of Cleveland, fourth pilot to reach here, ranked next to Quinby with a total elapsed time of 24:10:47. Bayless's time for the lap was 4:38:18.

J. R. Weddell of New Orleans made the distance in 4:16:30.

The fliers are to leave for Los Angeles tomorrow. They may stop at any point they choose to refuel. There are no control points between Douglas and Los Angeles.

Search for Flier Fails.

Special to The New York Times.

STROUDSBURG, Pa., July 26.—Growing apprehension was felt here tonight for the safety of Edward Todd of Pueblo, one of seventeen entries in the All-American Air Derby, who is believed to have crashed between the Poconos and Scranton Tuesday or Wednesday. A wide search was conducted for him today without success.

Todd had been reported in trouble several times since he left Cincinnati Tuesday morning. He was believed to have been seen last flying in the direction of Scranton with his ship going in wide circles, as though he were lost.

From Detroit came word that Todd had not reported to derby officials since late Tuesday, when he had been forced down at Port Jervis, N. Y., and was waiting for clear weather.

Officials said Todd was flying a low-wing monoplane of his own construction and carried no compass.

WON'T TAKE TARIFF ACTION.

Poland Plans No Measures in Regard to New American Rates.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WARSAW, July 26.—The Polish Ambassador to Washington, Tytus Filipowicz, said today that the Polish Government did not intend to take any action in regard to the new American tariff. He said the measure had only a small effect on Polish exports to the United States as it chiefly concerned Western Europe.

Before making his statement, M. Filipowicz conferred with the Minister of Commerce, Eugene Kwiatkowski, and the Foreign Minister, August Zaleski, on the subject.

main stairs are placed in a small hall suggestive of Monticello.

John Quincy Adams, as Secretary of State under Monroe, went to Oak Hill frequently for official conferences, and other noted men of the time were guests at the estate, such as William H. Crawford of Georgia, Secretary of the Treasury under Monroe, whom Monroe defeated for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency.

It was there that Monroe, the last President to wear knee breeches, cockade and sword, entertained at dinner Lafayette and John Quincy Adams, his successor in the White House.

At a later day Stonewall Jackson stationed his wagon trains on Oak Hill and planned to make a stand there should he be forced back from the second battle of Manassas. In yet a later day, on Oct. 28, 1926, President and Mrs. Coolidge visited the estate as the guests of Mr. Littleton.

Historical Furniture in House.

A fine antique sideboard stands in the dining room on the exact spot where stood a sideboard on the occasion when Lafayette and John Quincy Adams were entertained by Monroe. Mr. Littleton, upon his purchase of the property, acquired furniture and records that have been in the house since Monroe owned it and also carefully gathered other furniture of the period.

A Duncan Phyfe table made of mahogany was a gift to President Monroe from San Domingo. Five chairs in the house were owned by President John Adams. Some china that once belonged to George Washington, candlesticks and fire irons that were the property of James Madison at Montpelier, furniture that was owned by Washington's niece and other pieces that were owned by Commodore Preble, commander of the frigate Constitution, are also in the place.

In the library is a collection of white mahogany furniture designed by Stanford White that is unrivaled except in a few museum sets. Several ladder-back chairs in the library were made from elms removed from Yale College in 1888 to make way for new buildings.

In the archives of the estate are the original plans of the house and letters and memoranda penned by Monroe.

Prominent in the grounds is a fine orchard of Albermarle pippins. According to tradition, the first apples of this variety to be sent to Queen Victoria were taken from that orchard at the request of the then Prince of Wales, who was visiting the United States at the time and delighted in the fruit. The variety has since been a favorite in England and the most of it exported from the United States goes to the British Isles.

Place Bequeathed to Monroe

Monroe was residing in Washington when he was elected President. At that time he inherited the broad acres of Oak Hill from an uncle and immediately began the construction of the house. That was in 1821.

Monroe spent as much time as possible there during his Presidency, and upon his retirement in 1825 went there to live. His wife died there in 1830 and he then went to New York to make his home with his daughter and son-in-law, Samuel L. Gouverneur, being forced to sell Oak Hill because of his financial inability to maintain it. He died in New York in 1831.

Mrs. Monroe and another daughter were buried at Oak Hill, their bodies remaining there until recently, when they were removed to Richmond at the time President Monroe's remains were re-interred at the Virginia capital.

The estate passed from Monroe to Colonel John Fairfax, who later was on Longstreet's staff in the Civil War. In the late '70s it was sold to a Dr. Quimby, who, in turn, disposed of it a few years later to Henry Fairfax, son of Colonel John Fairfax and a State Senator of Virginia. Henry Fairfax was noted for his hospitality, entertaining many celebrities at Oak Hill, and incidentally possessing the most celebrated stud of hackney horses of the day in the United States, headed by the undefeated Matchless of Lornesboro.

Mr. Littleton bought the estate of the Henry Fairfax heirs. In remodeling the house, he added fifteen feet to both the east and west ends to give it a more harmonious appearance. This apparently conformed to the original plans, as foundations for such extensions were found at the time. Since his occupancy, the place has become more and more a point of public interest.

One other Monroe home stands, that at Fredericksburg, Va., which contains President Monroe's law office and which is now open as a museum.

BOOTLEGGER CLEARS SLAIN RADIO ORATOR

Signed Extortion Affidavit for Police Head Without Knowing Its Contents.

MOVIE OPERATOR FREED

Throngs Block Detroit Streets at Funeral of Jerry Buckley, Killed by Gangsters.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, July 26.—While thousands were paying tribute at the funeral of Jerry Buckley, radio announcer shot dead here early Wednesday by gangsters, a self-confessed bootlegger, Frank Chock, made a move to clear Buckley's name of racketeering charges.

Chock, signer of an affidavit produced by Police Commissioner Thomas C. Wilcox, in which Buckley was accused of "shaking down" Chock for $4,000, made a firm denial of the truth of the statement.

Thomas F. Kennedy, law partner of Buckley, obtained the second affidavit from Chock. In it Chock asserted that he did not know the contents of the affidavit he signed for Mr. Wilcox, and added that, to his knowledge, Buckley never was engaged in any racketeering and never had any connection with the underworld.

Chock also affirmed that he was taken to police headquarters by a detective for the purpose of signing the affidavit for the commissioner. Mr. Wilcox had declared that Chock volunteered the original statement.

During the morning, the case against Jack Klein, motion picture operator, who sat in a chair next to Buckley when the radio announcer was slain in the lobby of the La Salle Hotel, came up in Judge Frank Murphy's court and the police failed to produce evidence on which to hold Klein.

He was released on a writ of habeas corpus, and, so far as public information went, the police were as far as ever from tracing the killers of Buckley.

A woman, whose name was not divulged, held last night for questioning, was also freed.

Commissioner Wilcox asserted that from now on, nothing will be given to the press or public on the case until "the murderers are brought into court."

The greatest throng that ever gathered in Detroit to attend the funeral of a private citizen filled the streets in the vicinity of St. Gregory's Church while mass was being said for Buckley.

For blocks around the church, streets and house roofs were a solid mass of humanity. Men widely known in official, banking, business and professional circles were there, but the majority was composed of persons in humble circumstances who had listened to Buckley's voice but had never seen him personally.

Rain fell, but it was not noticed by the vast crowd. Police were obliged to make a lane through the crowd when the coffin was taken from the Buckley home, and at the church they nearly lost control of the situation. After the coffin had been carried in, the crowd closed in on the relatives and it was some minutes before they were rescued by a squad.

It was estimated that 100,000 persons looked upon the face of Buckley as his body lay in state at the home until after dawn today.

HITS BOULDER PAYMENTS.

Arizona Charges Dam Disbursements Are Illegal.

WASHINGTON, July 26 (AP).—A brief, asserting that the disbursement of the $10,660,000 appropriation for beginning construction on Boulder Dam is illegal, has been filed with the Controller General by Attorney General K. Berry Peterson of Arizona, special legal counsel for that State.

The brief sets forth Arizona's contention that provisions of the Boulder Dam act have not been complied with.

Mr. Peterson said Arizona would begin litigation in the Supreme Court as soon as it recovenes in an effort to establish the illegality of the construction.

The brief attacks contracts between the Interior Secretary and Los Angeles, and between the Secretary and the metropolitan water district of Southern California. It asserts that these agreements do not insure amortization of the $165,000,000 project. Secretary Wilbur contends the contracts do insure the reimbursement of the government.

Spanish Auto Tariff Compels Our Dealers to Reduce Staffs

By The Associated Press.

MADRID, July 26 (AP).—American automobile agencies in Spain have begun to reduce their personnel and overhead expenses because of the new Spanish tariff, which doubles duties on automobiles. The dealers regard the situation as critical.

Popular-priced cars previously paying from 2,000 to 4,000 pesetas duty now will pay from 4,000 to 8,000 [the peseta is now quoted at 11.45 cents], and the natural consequence is expected to be a considerable slump in sales, at least until the public has adjusted its buying attitude toward the higher prices.

SHIPPING BOARD ASKS ONLY $4,000,000 FUNDS

Appropriations Have Been Cut Steadily, but Total Cost has Been $3,683,569,000.

WASHINGTON, July 26 (AP).—The $3,000,000,000 government agency which spent one-third of that sum in a single year, plans to ask for only $4,000,000 for its maintenance next year.

Altogether $3,683,569,000 has been appropriated for the Shipping Board and the Merchant Fleet Corporation, the board's operating agency. Of that sum $1,067,183,000 was spent in a single year—1918, when the United States was at war and ordered the board to buy and build ships regardless of cost.

Since that year the appropriations have decreased steadily. They were $110,915,000 in 1922, $30,000,000 in 1925 and $6,000,000 for this year.

To allow the decrease in funds the board has sold hundreds of ships built or contracted for during the war and reduced its staff correspondingly. It is slowly going out of the shipping business, concentrating now on stimulation of the domestic merchant marine. For this latter purpose President J. R. Gordon of the Merchant Fleet Corporation estimates $4,000,000 will be enough next year.

The board now has in active operation only 186 of the more than 2,000 ships built during the war period. These are to be sold as soon as practicable. Forecasting further decreases in activities as far as actual operation of steamship lines, the board plans to cut its budget to $6,000,000 less than for last year.

In 1920 the board's payroll was about $23,000,000, but the fewer employes now draw only $2,288,513 annually. This latter figure will be decreased further for the next fiscal year as additional steamship lines and other properties are sold and existing government-operated lines are consolidated.

AIRPLANE SAVES PATIENT.

Boy Is Rushed Here From Connecticut for Operation.

Special to The New York Times.

CANAAN, Conn., July 26.—In a race with death, Bertram S. Rosenbaum Jr., 14 years old, of New York City was victorious by several hours yesterday when he went by airplane for an operation at a hospital on Seventy-seventh Street, New York City, during an acute attack of appendicitis.

The boy was with his parents at their Summer home in Williamstown, Mass., when he was stricken while in swimming. His condition was so critical that an airplane was chartered here.

The 110-mile trip was made in 50 minutes.

Physicians said that had two more hours elapsed the boy would have died.

The father is a member of the New York Stock Exchange and is associated with Ernest & Co.

WOMEN BRAVE JUNGLES.

Three on Way From South Africa to England Spurn Aid of Men.

NAIROBI, British East Africa, July 26 (AP).—Three women, the Misses Belcher, Budgell and Day, arrived here today from Cape Town on a manless adventure by motor car.

They left the southern city April 1 for England, determined to shun all male help throughout the journey, and they said that so far they have kep their resolution. Part of the trip was trying, in wild country over rough tracks instead of roads. Twice they were menaced by lions but were not molested.

EINSTEIN EVOLVING YET ANOTHER THEORY

By CLARENCE K. STREIT.

that intimidates the most brazen autograph collector. People simply stand at a respectful distance and stare, or tiptoe by these friends who knew each other before either was known to the world.

Speaking of those days before her husband died, a martyr to science, Mme. Curie smiled at her memory of the younger Einstein. He was the funniest man, she said. He was always thinking of the same thing, discussing the same problem of relativity and seeking to talk with any scientist working in any possibly related field.

Wants Better Child Education.

Though Dr. Einstein is devoted to his studies during the time taken by the translations here, he not only follows as closely as any the work of the intellectual cooperation committee, but he contributes much to it. He himself understands both French and English, so does not need the translations. But he prefers to speak to the committee in German, save for his short statements, which he makes in French.

Like Mme. Curie, Dr. Einstein shows special interest in problems touching child education. His longest statement to the committee—which meets in private—was to say that to him the main thing was how generally to improve the education of the young. The League could do no greater work, he held, than to help to make the elementary schools throughout the world better.

Teaching children the spirit of international cooperation, he said, was a task whose successful achievement would quite suffice to assure the full success of the Intellectual Cooperation Committee's work. It was extraordinary, he declared, how little relation there was now between the savants working in the different branches of science, though their work was really closely related. He did not hesitate to point to himself as a bad example, Dr. Einstein describing Dr. Einstein as a mathematician and physicist with a lamentable ignorance of chemistry.

Urges Colonial Information.

When the prominent British educationist, Sir Frank Heath, told the committee it was insufficiently informed on what had been done by the Dutch in the East Indies, the Americans in the Philippines and the Belgians in the Congo in teaching the natives, Dr. Einstein followed his declaration with the greatest interest and immediately urged the committee to procure this information.

Dr. Einstein came to this meeting with an unexpressed prejudice against one of the members. When that member addressed the committee Dr. Einstein listened carefully and found he spoke truly. When the speaker had finished Dr. Einstein alone got up, went to him and warmly expressed his praise. It was only when a curious friend of Dr. Einstein's mentioned the incident that he admitted his previous prejudice. He explained, with his childlike candor, that he felt he had done the man an injustice in thinking badly of him and owed him amends.

Aside from his fame, Dr. Einstein makes the strongest impression on the committee and the secretariat officials because of what one of the latter called "his extraordinary frankness and sincerity and the perfectly open mind with which he approaches and discusses every question."

Laughs at Intellectuals.

This official asked the professor if he realized what impression his words made here. Dr. Einstein looked at him and said, "But I only say what I think."

An official who is more accustomed to deal with diplomats than with Einsteins is still wondering what would happen to the League if the former became equally frank.

When the same official remarked it was hard to find intellectuals who could work together, Dr. Einstein, who can still laugh like a boy, said, "Yes, the intellectuals always have microscopes before their eyes."

Another of the German mathematician's closest friends on the committee is the great French mathematician, Paul Painlevé, known to the political world as several times Premier of France, known to the aviation world as the first passenger to fly with the Wrights and known to his friends as a most absent-minded man who will invite you to a banquet and forget to order it or to come himself.

There are others from the political world on the committee. Nicolas Titulescu, Rumanian Minister to London, former member of the Council and former professor of international law; Professor Alfred Rocco, Italian Minister of Justice, and Mario Cornejo, the Peruvian member of the Council.

Savants From Asia Attend.

Asia is represented by two men of exceptional interest, Sir Jagadis Chandra Bose, founder of the Bose Research Institute at Calcutta, and Professor Akita Tanakadate of the Imperial University of Tokyo. Sir Jagadis's theory that plants live in many respects like animals and have a similar cellular structure, and his experiments in this field have attracted wide attention. He has shown, for instance, that aspirin can make a drooping flower revive like a human being, whereas if poison is injected it will die—unless an antidote is administered as to a human being, for then the flower likewise recovers.

Professor Tanakadate is a little bearded Japanese in his seventies, who has just flown from Paris to Constantinople to investigate how President Kemal's action in forcing Turkey to change from the Arabic to the Latin alphabet is working out. For years he has been a leading spirit in Japan, working for the country to adopt the Roman alphabet in place of the 53,000 Chinese characters which the Japanese now use.

To Study World Alphabet.

He found the Turkish experiment was working out well. He is further encouraged now by his success in getting the Intellectual Cooperation Committee to decide to study the possibilities of the world adoption of a unified alphabetical system so that the same letters would represent the same sounds everywhere.

Nearly all the intellectual fields, indeed, are represented on the committee.

There is its chairman, Professor Gilbert Murray, a great Greek scholar. There is Vernon Kellogg, secretary of the National Research Council of the United States, who, despite an illness which prevents him from joining in the discussion, has none the less come to attend the meeting. There is Miss Kristine Bonneview, professor of zoology at the University of Oslo, the only other woman member present in addition to Mme. Curie. There is Jules Casares, the Spanish writer, and the Czech historian, Joseph Susta.

There is such a strong group, in short, that the League officials, who were rather discouraged by the previous results of the intellectual cooperation section, are now optimistic that when this committee finishes next week the work of reorganizing the section it will be on a much better basis for the future.

FIGHTS 2 ROBBERS, FELLS ONE BY SHOT

Jersey Garage Man Wrests Pistol From Thug and Fires as Pair Flee.

Dumped From Automobile at Door, Bayonne Man Is Identified as Thug Despite His Denials.

Special to The New York Times.

HACKENSACK, N. J., July 26.—When he was attacked by two gunmen early this morning, Anthony Smith, night manager of a gasoline service station at State Highway Route 2 and Paterson Plank Road, East Rutherford, gave battle, wrested a revolver from one of the robbers and fired four shots, one of which apparently had fatal effect.

Vincent Terraciano, 24 years old, who gave his address as 90 Linard Street, Bayonne, N. J., was reported dying in the Hackensack Hospital. He was hit in the back, the bullet penetrating his stomach, when Mr. Smith fired at the two fleeing men. Two hours after the hold-up the night orderly at the hospital saw an automobile drive up to the main entrance. A body was dumped out and the car sped on. Terraciano, still conscious, told a story of being picked up by robbers, but refused to admit he was one of Mr. Smith's assailants, although positively identified by the garage man.

Mr. Smith told Detective Lieutenant Nathan Allyn of Prosecutor Edward O. West's staff that he was inside the service station shortly after 1 A. M. when two men entered and asked the way to Bayonne. Mr. Smith was about to explain the route when one of the strangers leveled a pistol at him, with a command to "stick 'em up."

Mr. Smith obeyed, but when the robber turned his head to see where his accomplice was, the garage man ducked and grasped the revolver. Mr. Smith was victor in a short tussle and the gunmen rushed for the door. As they ran together through the doorway Mr. Smith opened fire, but his attackers disappeared in the dark. The garage manager informed the police by telephone and at 3 A. M. he was called to the hospital, where he declared that the wounded man was one of his attackers. He told the police he had fired blindly and thought all his shots had missed.

Later the mother and wife of Terraciano arrived at the hospital. Questioned by the police, they protested that they could furnish no information about the wounded man's friends. The police said a third man had been at the wheel of an automobile parked at the Carlstadt railroad station.

Hospital physicians said Terraciano could not recover. Detective Lieutenant Allyn said that Mr. Smith might be held on a technical charge of manslaughter if Terraciano died.

White Brothers Must Die For Killing Negro Couple

ATLANTA, July 26 (AP).—The Georgia Supreme Court has decided that two young white brothers must die because they killed two aged Negroes.

The court upheld the conviction and death sentence today of Harvey Bradberry, Oconee County youth, for the murders of Doc Elder and his wife. On Monday it affirmed the conviction and sentence of his brother, Wayman. Raymond Cooper, another white youth, who was tried jointly with the Bradberry brothers, was sentenced to life imprisonment.

They lured the aged Negro from his cabin and beat and stabbed him to death last year. They returned and cut his wife's throat and stole the Negroes' savings.

TOKYO FLIGHT ABANDONED.

Bromley, With Aide and Plane, Sails for Yokohama—To Fly Back.

SEATTLE, Wash., July 26 (AP).—With their plane, the City of Tacoma, lashed on the after deck of the American Mail liner President Lincoln, Harold Bromley, Tacoma aviator, and Harold Gatty, co-pilot, left today for Tokyo, from where they hope to fly back to the United States.

The aviators will disembark at Yokohama and travel by train to Tokyo.

"I expect to be back on American soil within three weeks," Bromley said. "I am very confident of making the projected non-stop flight. My plane has plenty of fuel and will have the additional advantage of a west-to-east wind. Only Harold Gatty and myself are sailing to Japan. John Buffelen, our backer, will remain in Tacoma."

Bromley has planned a transpacific flight for more than a year.

The plane was dismantled last night after a sudden decision to abandon a Tacoma to Tokyo flight attempt.

Bromley had announced he would fly from Tacoma to Tokyo with one stop in Alaska for refueling, but difficulty of obtaining a satisfactory landing field in Alaska caused abandonment of the plan.

ENJOINED ON RUSSIAN FILMS

Herman Axelbank Loses in Suit Over Pictures of Revolution.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., July 26.—Supreme Court Justice Graham Witschief denied today a motion to name a receiver to settle the difficulties of Max Eastman and Herman Axelbank over a contract regarding the disposition of motion pictures of the Russian revolution taken by Axelbank. The court, however, enjoined Axelbank from interfering with the completion and exploitation of the films in accordance with the contract. Axelbank is further enjoined from disposing of the films, or from incurring any additional expense in connection with their preparation, and from interfering with the editing of them by Eastman.

"It appears to the court," said the decision, "that what the parties need, more than they need a lawsuit or the intervention of the court, is the advice and intervention of some disinterested, competent business man."

22 IN SWIM TODAY AROUND MANHATTAN

Racers to Disregard Warning by Wynne of Danger From Polluted Waters.

THREE GIRLS IN CONTEST

First Race Around Island Starts at 10:45 A. M. in East River at 89th St.—$1,000 in Prizes.

Twenty-two swimmers, three of them girls, will take part in the swimming race around Manhattan Island today in spite of warnings from Health Commissioner Wynne against the danger of typhoid fever in the polluted waters. The contestants will start from Eighty-ninth Street and the East River at 10:45 o'clock this morning, swimming north to Hell Gate, thence through the Harlem and down the Hudson past the Battery.

The competition is under the auspices of the International Professional Swimmers' Association, which is offering prizes of $500 to the winner, $250 to the second to complete the course, $100 to the third and $150 to the first woman to finish.

Although the association officials announced that all precautions possible would be taken to protect the swimmers against the menaces pointed out by the Health Department, Dr. Wynne remained skeptical and denounced the plans as "silly, vain proceedings," linking the contest with the prevailing endurance contest craze.

"Most of these contests are rackets which enrich the promoters, who have no regard for the health of the contestants," he declared. "This is particularly true of any swimming contest in waters adjacent to New York. Such a contest is not a salt-water swimming contest—it is a salty sewage contest."

The promoters are exposing themselves to any damage suits that may arise from illnesses to the contestants, particularly typhoid, he added, but he refused to say whether his department would take any action in case of possible criminal negligence.

Although several swimmers have at various times made the circle of twenty-seven and one-half miles around Manhattan, the event today will mark the first competition. Among the men swimmers entered are William J. Sadlo of Brooklyn, who has swum around the island three times before; Clarence Ross and William F. Goll, both of whom have scored in New York swimming competitions, and Sam Shields of Miami, Fla., another long-distance swimmer.

The three girls are Miss Lillian Garrick, 18-year-old holder of the women's record for the course around Manhattan; Miss Anne Priller Benoit of Holyoke, Mass., winner of fourth place in the 1928 Wrigley marathon swim at Toronto, and Miss Emmi Busse, a German girl now living in Union City, N. J., who has taken part in endurance swims in Germany.

The present record for men is held by Byron Summers of Alameda, Cal., who swam around the island in 8 hours 56 minutes. Miss Garrick's time for the women's record is 10 hours 13 minutes. Both records were set on solo swims.

Iowan Stung on Vein by Bee Dies of Poison in 20 Minutes

Special to The New York Times.

SIOUX CITY, Iowa, July 26.—Stung on the wrist by a bee as he assisted carpenters with some work about his home today, H. J. Dagle, 49 years old, died within twenty minutes and before a physician could be called.

Examination by physicians showed that the sting was directly over a vein and that poison penetrated the vein and was carried directly to the heart.

Dagle some months ago fell down an elevator shaft where he was employed and his back was broken. He was still in a plaster cast at the time of his death.

ICE CREAM TRUCKS HELD UP FOR $800

Two Bronx Drivers Robbed Within Two Minutes and Police See Work of Same Gang.

5 HOLD-UP MEN GET AWAY

Two Take Part in One Theft, While Three, All in Blue Shirts, Stage Raid Soon Afterward.

Two drivers of two ice-cream trucks operated by J. M. Horton & Co. were held up and robbed yesterday afternoon in the Bronx of a total of $800. Both robberies took place within a few minutes of 2 o'clock.

Michael Boland of 4,025 Lowerre Place, the Bronx, was the first victim. With Thomas Fitzgerald, his helper, he was proceeding along Washington Avenue after making several deliveries when two men jumped on the running boards, aimed pistols at them and ordered them to drive on. After driving a block Boland was ordered to halt and came to a stop at the corner of 188th Street.

There, while one robber covered Boland and Fitzgerald, the other rifled their pockets, taking between $350 and $400, most of which had been collected from soda fountains. The gunmen told them to keep quiet, ran back a block, entered an automobile they had parked there and drove off.

Peter Zenelli of 686 Westchester Avenue and his helper, John Kried, were the victims of the second hold-up, which took place at Harding and Brinsmade Avenues. Zenelli had stopped his truck to rearrange the ice cream containers when three armed men, all wearing blue shirts, covered him and Kried with pistols, took $400 in cash and fled in an automobile in which they had apparently followed the truck.

Detectives of the Bronx Park and Westchester stations, who started an investigation, said the hold-ups were committed by members of the same gang and that in both cases the gunmen had followed their victims for some time before robbing them.

GOES TO BURY WIFE; HELD AS DEFAULTER

Ex-Mayor Spaulding Jailed at Manchester, N. H., on Charge Three Years Old.

LIVED HERE AS FUGITIVE

His Wife Stuck to Him, and When She Died He Took Body to Her Native City.

Special to The New York Times.

MANCHESTER, N. H., July 26.—A three-year police search for former Mayor Harry W. Spaulding ended today at the new grave of his wife and companion through success and adversity.

Through years of affluence as assistant postmaster, Controller of Customs at Boston, then Mayor of Manchester, and through hunter, haunted years as a fugitive from justice, Spaulding was blessed with the love and help of one woman.

She died a few days ago in New York and today, for love of her he was in custody here on a 3-year-old indictment charging that he was a defaulter. He was carrying out her dying wish to be buried in her native city when arrested.

The police made no move until he had turned away from the new mound in the Pine Grove Cemetery. They placed him under arrest at the home of his wife's relatives for the alleged embezzlement of $2,900 in 1927 from a woman's estate of which he was executor.

Mrs. Alfred F. Langley of Sandow, widow of a Freemont physician, charged Spaulding with the embezzlement, and it was on her information that the ex-Mayor was arrested.

Mrs. Langley, who had been a friend of Spaulding, learned from a relative that Mrs. Spaulding had died suddenly in New York. She informed the authorities and suggested that the woman's body might be brought back to Manchester for burial.

Manchester officials communicated with Sheriff Spinney at Portsmouth, who held the warrant for Spaulding's arrest, and it was forwarded here.

Although the former Mayor was under surveillance from the moment he arrived here, he was not aware of it until his duty to the memory of his wife had been discharged.

Spaulding is 55. His wife was Florence Francis, the daughter of a well-known Manchester family.

TRIO AT SEA IN BOAT SAVED AFTER 9 DAYS

Starving, Parching Floridians, Picked Up by Steamer, Drank Oil in 370-Mile Drift.

JACKSONVILLE, Fla., July 26 (AP).—Nearly exhausted from thirst, hunger and exposure, three men from Fort Lauderdale today related a story of how they were rescued at sea by a passing freighter after floating for nine days in an open motor boat.

The men are George W. Thomas, E. W. Thompson and Eddie Nicholson, a Negro. They were picked up Thursday night by the steamship Bakersfield about fifty miles southeast of Charleston, S. C., and brought here.

Leaving Fort Lauderdale on July 16 for an outing in a thirty-foot boat, the men said they carried only a gallon of water, two boxes of crackers and a watermelon as provisions, as they had intended to return home the same day.

Some distance off shore, the gasoline supply became exhausted. Helpless, the men were carried by the Gulf Stream to a point off Charleston Lightship, 370 miles away, before they were picked up by the freighter.

Found collapsed in the bottom of their boat, the men were lifted aboard the Bakersfield and food and water were given to them. They said that with their small supply of water gone they drank a gallon of lubricating oil, which was the only other liquid aboard their boat. All suffered sunburn.

Officers of the freighter reported seeing three sharks swimming about the helpless boat at the time of the rescue.

The motor boat was seized by customs men at the mouth of the St. Johns River here while it was in tow of the ferighter. The officers said that the men could not produce the necessary papers entitling them to operate their craft.

Mrs. Martha Manning will Broadcast news of Macy's via WOR

instead of at 11.15 A. M.

The shift in the morning program will become effective on Monday, July 28. The Average Woman is responsible for the change. Six hundred housewives in Manhattan, Bronx, Brooklyn, Westchester, Queens, and New Jersey, were interviewed in order to determine what available hour was the most convenient, and what type of Macy news was most interesting to Macy customers. Here are some of the findings:

35% of the families have breakfast at 7:30 A. M.

31% of the husbands leave for work at 8:00 A. M.

49% of the children are at school or at large by 8:30 A. M.

36% of the breakfast dishes are washed at 8:45 and 9:00 A. M.

68% of the women leave their homes to shop or air the kiddies during the morning.

55% of the women are out at 11:15 A. M.

67% of the women who shop in New York leave home before 11 A. M.

By adding this up and dividing by x and turning seventeen handsprings, we arrived at these conclusions:

There is a brief respite for the lady of the house between 8:30 A. M. when she gets rid of the family, and 9:00 A. M., when she advances on the dishes.

8:30 A. M. is a better hour for the Macy program than 11:15.

So if you have a radio, remember Mrs. Manning will be in circulation at 8:30 every day except Saturday and Sunday. And if you haven't a radio, you'd better come to Macy's at once and buy one so that you won't miss any of the radio news concerning Macy values for your home and your family.

FEARS STREET WORK WILL STOP IN QUEENS

Halleran Sees Heavy Loss if Corporation Counsel Bars Present Methods.

ATTACKS HIGGINS'S VIEWS

Acting Borough President Defends Use of Stone and Asphalt in Resurfacing.

All highway maintenance work in Queens will be brought to a standstill if the Corporation Counsel rules against the present methods of resurfacing dirt and paved roads, according to a statement made yesterday by John J. Halleran, Acting Borough President.

Commissioner Halleran's statement followed an announcement by James A. Higgins, Commissioner of Accounts, that the Corporation Counsel had been asked to pass upon the practice of the Queens Highway Bureau in maintaining dirt roads with crushed stone and repairing macadam roads with asphalt. Mr. Higgins said that he has evidence that unimproved streets in the borough were maintained with macadam or asphalt and that pavements were laid in thoroughfares which previously had no pavement.

Mr. Halleran admitted that Mr. Higgins was correct in stating that such materials were used to give dirt roads improved surfaces. He stated, however, that the new method of highway maintenance practiced by the Queens Highway Bureau of repairing dirt roads with broken stone, binder and screening outlasted the old method of repairing such roads with steam ashes, which were rolled and oiled. The cost of broken stone, which is purchased by the cubic yard, was only slightly higher than that of steam ashes, which are purchased by the ton, but one cubic yard of broken stone outlasted a ton of steam ashes in road repair jobs, he asserted.

Calls New Method the Best.

The broken stone method of treating dirt roads resulted in the construction of a permanent surface resembling macadem but which was not true macadam, Mr. Halleran declared. However, this improved method of resurfacing outlasted the old method, under heavy traffic conditions, by two years, or more than double the life of the surface constructed under the old method, he said.

"The highway repair methods of the entire city of New York are involved in the present situation," Mr. Halleran said. "If it is against the provisions of the city charter to maintain the roads and streets of Queens by the most improved methods, which cost less than the old sytem of hand labor and less durable materials, then we want a definite ruling on the question.

"If the Corporation Counsel finds that it is illegal to place new road material on the surface of dirt roads, then all maintenance work now being performed in the Borough of Queens must stop. We shall be plunged back to a condition that existed thirty years ago, when Queens was a borough of bogs and cowpaths. Under the ruling which Mr. Higgins intimates will be forthcoming the Highway Bureau will be unable to do any type of maintenance work except the scraping of dirt roads and the filling in of holes and ruts with mud or ashes.

"If we are forced to revert to archaic and obsolete practices a large part of our Highway Bureau force, comprising more than 1,000 men, will have to be laid off.

"There is no profit to any one except the home owners and taxpayers under our present system. Perhaps there is resentment among the ranks of contractors who desire to do the work at a profit that is now being done by city labor.

"The work is costing less under our present maintenance methods than previously under old methods and is being performed in a more thorough and scientific manner. The money we are spending was appropriated by the Board of Estimate for the general improvement of dirt roads.

Material Produced by City.

"If we use crushed stone instead of steam ashes and other old-type materials and give the public longer-lasting, more serviceable and less expensive roads with no increased appropriation from the Board of Estimate, then we are accomplishing something that we should be commended for instead of being condemned. All the asphalt used to repair macadam roads is manufactured in the city plants in this borough.

"If we come into conflict with a sharp and narrow interpretation of the law in using modern methods, materials and equipment to maintain roads, then we stand ready to be convicted for our act.

"Any interpretation of the law that would prevent the use of materials now being consumed in highway maintenance work on dirt roads in this borough, such as macadam and broken stone, must necessarily apply to all other resurfacing materials. If we cannot use one class of material to give a surface to a dirt road, we cannot use any other. Any ruling against present methods must necessarily bring to an end all maintenance work on dirt and macadam streets."

GIRLS REGRET PRANK THAT OUSTED MIDDIES

Washington Pair Lament as Youths Are Dismissed and Quit Academy.

Special to The New York Times.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., July 26.—Official word was received at the Naval Academy this morning that the President had approved the recommendation of Rear Admiral Samuel S. Robinson, superintendent of the Naval Academy, for dismissal of Midshipmen Lawrence C. Myatt of Quincy, Mass., and Miller S. Burgin of St. Petersburg, Texas, held responsible for the presence of two young women at dinner in Bancroft Hall on July 13, and they were notified at once that they had been dismissed.

Later the two midshipmen left the academy for their homes. They said that at present they had not made any plans for the future. Fifteen other midshipmen, held responsible in a lesser degree for the incident, are being punished by the infliction of demerits and confinement to the Reina Mercedes for a period of one to two months.

WASHINGTON, July 26 (AP).—The two girls whose desire to share the food of Annapolis midshipmen led to the dismissal from the Naval Academy of the youths who helped them attain it were described today as dismayed at the stern discipline applied to the offenders.

They were Misses Mary Eleanor Hayden and Lorette Taylor. Mrs. R. L. Taylor, mother of one of the girls, said her daughter and Miss Hayden "naturally are much broken up about the turn the prank has taken."

Mrs. Taylor said the two girls went in no part of the academy other than the mess hall, being supplied with white blouses and fatigue hats outside that portion of the academy.

ATTORNEY GENERAL SPEAKS

Bennett, marked the closing session today of the annual convention of the county organization, which opened yesterday. George Welch of Valley Stream is the new county commander.

At the business session this afternoon Attorney General Hamilton Ward was the principal speaker. He explained the State laws that have been enacted to provide relief for veterans. He advocated the setting up of a legal aid bureau in the State Department of Law as an additional method of bringing benefits to deserving soldiers. VAN LOAD OF FILMS SEIZED AS OBSCENE

Police Raid Hoboken House and Garage After Long Search for Source of Pictures.

PAPERS ALSO CONFISCATED

But Detectives Refuse to Say if Fraternal Orders Are Listed—"Stag" Guest Made Complaint.

Hudson County detectives and policemen raided a three-story frame building and a wooden garage at 500 Madison Avenue, Hoboken, yesterday and confiscated a van-load of allegedly obscene motion picture films, valued at more than $100,000.

Charles Russo, 23 years old, who was arrested as he was about to leave the place with several reels of film, was held without bail, pending further investigation. The police said he admitted freely being the proprietor, but they declared he was trying to shield the actual owner, who is now being sought.

The raid was the result of months of work by private detectives employed by The New York Evening Graphic. They were put on the case when a man who had attended a "stag" party at a lodge in Southern New Jersey, where he said obscene films were exhibited, caused the arrest of the man who had furnished the films. When their report was laid before John Drewen, prosecutor of Hudson County, yesterday he assigned six men to locate Russo.

They had no difficulty in finding him, but no one else was in the establishment, which was said by the detectives and by Hoboken policemen to be the distributing point for a large business representing an investment of several hundred thousand dollars.

The films, of which hundreds of reels were found, both in the main building and in the garage, were of standard size, not adaptable to home motion-picture projectors.

A mass of records was confiscated along with the films, but detectives declined to confirm or deny a report that the names of lodges of prominent fraternal organizations were found in them. The films and some allegedly obscene books which were also confiscated, were removed to a storage warehouse.

Mr. Drewen announced that he would call on authorities throughout New Jersey to assist in a search for the studios where the films were produced. Detectives said they had evidence that some of them were produced in Atlantic City and others in Long Island City.

Scribner Contest Closes Sept. 20.

Scribner's Magazine announced yesterday that its $5,000 prize long-story contest would not close until Sept. 20 and that, contrary to reports, the winner had not yet been selected. "The confusion arises," the magazine states, "from the fact that Scribner's is publishing contestant stories as rapidly as it can find them. The first such story appears in the August issue of the magazine and others will follow each month.

RIO DE JANEIRO, July 26.—Joao Pessoa, President of the State of Parahyba and Liberal candidate for the Vice Presidency of Brazil in the March 1 elections, was assassinated tonight in the city of Recife. He was slain by a political enemy.

President Pessoa, shortly before being defeated in the Spring elections, broke with José Pereira, a powerful political leader, who a little later headed an unsuccessful rebellion in the State of Parahyba. Dr. Pessoa ran on the Liberal ticket headed by Dr. Getulio Vargas as candidate for the Brazilian Presidency.

NEW LONDON, Conn., July 26 (AP).—The Rev. Arthur Lee Kinsolving, rector of Grace Church at Amherst, Mass., who is spending his vacation at Fishers Island, N. Y., today confirmed reports that he had accepted a call to succeed Bishop-elect Henry K. Sherill as rector of Trinity Church, Boston. He is expected to begin his duties the latter part of October.

Arthur Lee Kinsolving, who has been faculty director of religious activities at Amherst College and rector of Grace Church there for six years, belongs to a family which has given two bishops and many clergymen to the Protestant Episcopal Church. The bishops were the late Right Rev. George H. Kinsolving, who was bishop of Texas, and the Right Rev. Lucian Lee Kinsolving, who was bishop of Southern Brazil.

Arthur Lee Kinsolving was born in Huntington, L. I., Aug. 24, 1899. He is the son of the Rev. Dr. Arthur B. Kinsolving and Mrs. Sally Archer Bruce Kinsolving. He was educated at the University of Virginia and the Virginia Episcopal Theological Seminary, and was a Rhodes scholar at Oxford. He was ordained a deacon in 1923 by the late Bishop John Gardner Murray and advanced to the priesthood in 1924 by Bishop George H. Kinsolving.

He is a member of the executive committee of Students' Work of the Protestant Episcopal Church and recording secretary of the First Province of that communion. The Boston post he is taking was once held by Phillips Brooks.

the snow from their sidewalks—when the snow falls.

In Philadelphia the heat was so oppressive that an order was issued permitting the police to go on duty in their shirt sleeves, following the example of the Superintendent of Police, who took his cue from Lemuel B. Schofield, director of the Department of Public Safety.

With all Maryland suffering from a thirty-day drought in which there has been a rainfall of only .64 inch, present restrictions on the use of water in Baltimore were continued because the water supply was at a record low level.

Drought Damages Crops.

The drought has worked a serious hardship on field crops in most of Pennsylvania, according to reports given to The Associated Press by Director of Plant Industry R. H. Bell. The drought in Kentucky is growing more serious and in Richmond, Va., the authorities have further restricted the use of water from twelve to eight hours daily. The western part of Virginia has been hardest hit by the prolonged dry spell. Arkansas also was reported suffering from a serious drought. Continued lack of rain in parts of Alabama had caused serious damage to crops, but rain fell in that section yesterday. The drought in Southern Georgia was broken by a two-inch rainfall around Macon.

In New York State, Buffalo, with a temperature of 88 at 1 P. M., fared worse than New York City. Albany reported temperatures in the 80s all morning. In Jamestown, N. Y., in the southwestern corner of the State, it was 80 degrees at 10 A. M. Albany reported 79 and Utica 72.

20,000 Prepared to Sleep on Beach.

About 400,000 persons visited Coney Island yesterday and most of them donned bathing suits. Some came prepared to spend the night as well as the day on the beach. Police Captain James Gillen, in charge of the Coney Island police, estimated that more than 20,000 were ready to sleep on the sand. This number, larger even than the crowd of a week earlier, attested to the growing popularity of the beach at night, he said.

Many of the night visitors went with blankets, hoping it would be cool enough to use them. Fifty policemen patrolled the sand to silence noise and keep away rowdies.

The body of Michael Saluk, 18 years old, of 55 Clinton Street, was still missing last night. After a party in New York he and four or five companions drove in an automobile to Coney Island and went in swimming at 5 A. M. yesterday at the foot of West Twentieth Street, west of the Steeplechase Pier. The beach was deserted and Saluk went into the water without a bathing suit. Getting beyond his depth he yelled for help and Samuel Goodman, 19, of 123 Rivington Street, one of his companions, went to the rescue. Both were dashed by the waves against a rock jetty and Goodman lost his hold. Saluk's body was not seen again and the marine police hunted for it unsuccessfully.

Sebastian Colonia, 10, of 57 Twenty-eighth Avenue, Brooklyn, went in swimming with Pasquale Savarina, also 10 years old, of 73 Monroe Street off Larsen's dock at the foot of Bay Forty-seventh Street shortly after noon yesterday. According to the story Savarina told the Bath Beach police an hour and a half later, Colonia seemed to be in trouble in the water and then disappeared. Savarina said he spent an hour looking for his friend's body. While the missing boy's mother was hysterical on the beach a marine police launch grappled vainly for the body.

Mrs. Julia Braun, 20, of 203 East Thirty-seventh Street was prostrated by the heat on the Coney Island beach at the foot of West Sixteenth Street. She was taken by Dr. Eisenstein to the Coney Island Hospital.

Mrs. Josephine Gallo, 45, of 122 East 116th Street, Manhattan, died on the beach at Coney Island just after having come out of the surf at the Brighton Baths, foot of Coney Island Avenue. She had gone to the beach with her husband and two children. Mr. Gallo told the police that his wife had been a sufferer from heart disease for more than a year. Dr. Samuel Zeiger of the Coney Island Avenue and Police Emergency Squad 11, in charge of Sergeant Charles Holst, worked over her for an hour with an inhalator.

Sophie Kuzank, 10, of 1 Salem Avenue, Carteret, N. J., was drowned when the undertow from an excursion boat in Staten Island Sound pulled her beyond her depth. Another child, Elizabeth Lausky, 10, of Bergen Street, Carteret, was rescued by James Rufnak, 12, of Mercer Street, Carteret. The children were wading when the boat passed.

Two youths who had ventured too far out while bathing off West Thirty-second Street, Coney Island, were saved from drowning last night by Cornelius Callaghan and William Lott, president and superintendent, respectively, of the Sea Gate Association.

Mr. Callaghan and Mr. Lott were sitting on the porch of the Atlantic Yacht Club when they heard cries for help. They ran to a small boat and rowed out just in time to catch the lads, who were almost exhausted, holding them above water until a motor boat arrived and picked them up. It took half an hour before the boys were revived and could be sent back to their homes in Coney Island. They are Abraham Newman, 16, and Benjamin Sobownisky, 19, both of 3,201 West Thirty-second Street.

Other drownings were reported in widely separated towns in the metropolitan district. Fred Iriano, 11, of 173 Brighton Avenue, Belleville, N. J., and Fred Bisyogo, 7, of Warren Street, were drowned in Davey's old mill pond at the foot of East Baldwin Street before John Bulcato, a messenger boy, who had seen them struggling in the water, could bring help.

Captain Charles Jensen and a squad of police, together with Fire Chief George Koeber, all of Bloomfield, and Fire Chief N. Laurence Perry of Glenridge, N. J., worked over the boys for more than an hour with an inhalator before giving them up.

In Morristown, N. J., Jack Walker, 18, a Negro caddy of the Braidburn Country Club, at Florham Park, was drowned while swimming in the Passaic River.

In Atlantic City, Joseph Smith, 45, a Negro, who lived on Baltic Avenue, at Maryland Avenue, was drowned while bathing in the surf off Main Avenue, between Atlantic and Pacific Avenues.

Hundreds of automobilists en route from Camden and Philadelphia to New York were delayed for several hours yesterday when the Federal Street Bridge in Camden, N. J., over the Cooper River, swelled with the heat, while it was being raised to permit a boat to pass and could not be lowered until the metal had cooled and contracted. The bridge was raised at 3 P. M. and it was not until 7 P. M. that the metal had cooled sufficiently to permit the span to be lowered. The thermometer had mounted to 97 degrees.

16 Bathers Rescued at Rockaways.

With 350,000 on the beaches, the Rockaways counted their largest Saturday crowd of the season. Sixteen bathers were rescued from the surf, but there was no drowning reported.

Five small children who had waded out to a sandbar off Beach Eighty-fourth Street, Rockaway Beach, at low tide kept lifeguards Leo Margolin and Alfred Loos and their catamaran busy for half an hour rescuing them when the tide came in.

The lifeguards carried the 4-year-old Eobing twins, Frank and Harry, back to the beach, but the other children said first that they'd swim ashore. One by one they tried it, weakened and made no objection to being pulled onto the catamaran. They were 6-year-old Eda Skoller, who lives with her parents and the Eobings at 152 Beach Eighty-third Street; George Levin, 7, of the same address, and Eda Wolfson, 8, who lives next door at No. 150.

Harry Burgman, 13, of 155 Beach Twenty-fifth Street, Far Rockaway, was rescued off Beach Twenty-sixth Street by Life Guard William Fishman after the undertow had started to pull him out. He received first aid and went home.

Lifeguards Margolin and Loos also rescued off Beach Eighty-fourth Street, at different times, Helen Lapoff, 22, of 290 Georgia Avenue, Brooklyn, and John Tapolus, 36, of 421 First Avenue, Manhattan.

Three boys who ventured out to sea in a canoe capsized off Beach Eighty-seventh Street and were rescued by Life Guards Carolyn, Colin and McLaughlin. They were John Johnson, 16, his brother Philip, 18, and Edward Simpson, 13, all of 312 Beach Eighty-eighth Street, Rockaway Beach. The Johnson boys could swim but Edward could not. He was pulled out of the water semiconscious and worked over by the life guards for some time before he was able to go home.

John Breif, 20, of 349 Lincoln Avenue, Brooklyn, was caught by the undertow at Beach Seventy-third Street, Arverne, and was brought to shore by Life Guards Grace and Flynn.

Three swimmers in the still water of Jamaica Bay at Howard Beach went beyond their depth and were rescued by Life Guards Bellport and Corrigan. They were: Calvin Hinch, 16 years old, of 68-46 Booth Street, Elmhurst; Anna Daro, 17, of 327 North Jersey Avenue, Brooklyn, and Mary Totaro, 27, of 330 East 118th Street, Manhattan. Miss Jennie Boceth, 22, of 54-63 Thirty-third Street, Elmhurst, went beyond her depth at Shellbank Basin, adjacent to Howard Beach, and was rescued by Life Guards Collins and Lavelle.

Because there were three drownings last year during the evening hours after the life guards are off duty, while none have occurred this season at the Rockaways or Howard Beach while they were patrolling, S. Meredith Strong, Superintendent of Public Buildings in Queens, who has charge of the life guards, urged people to confine their bathing to the daytime.

SHOPPING for MEN with Betty Bruce

It's Smart to be Comfortable!

Why let that man of yours swelter in the heat when it's smart to be comfortable and cool suits of tropical worsted are so inexpensive! After pricing a number of these suits at a John David Shop I decided that a man could buy three or four of them for less than a high priced tailor would charge for one hot, stuffy affair and always be spruce and well dressed. The beauty of these tropical weight suits is that they are made of fine, light worsted which takes a press, holds its shape and always looks trim.

THE TWO-PIECE TROPICAL WORSTED SUITS (coat and waistcoat) at the John David shops are priced at $25. They have smart two button jackets, patch pockets and are all silk trimmed. There are navy blues, heather blues, Oxford grays, Cambridge grays, smart shades of tan, as well as stripes on grounds of navy blue and gray.

I ALSO SAW A SMART THREE-PIECE TROPICAL WORSTED (coat, waistcoat, and trousers) priced at $35 and a stunning Glen Urquhart three-piece model at $30. The $35 suit was a hair line striped Cambridge gray. Both styles had outside patch pockets and were all silk trimmed.

Visit the John David Shop at Fifth Avenue and 43rd Street or the Broadway establishment at 32nd Street and inspect these suits. I know they will meet with your approval in both style and price.

WALDMAN DEMANDS CITY INQUIRY AGAIN

Socialist Reiterates Charge That Grafters Are Aided by Governor's Refusal to Act.

SEES TAMMANY FAVORED

Tells Workers at Ulmer Park Executive Agreed to Higgins Investigation as a Blind.

Louis Waldman, Socialist choice for Governor, called yesterday upon Governor Roosevelt to reconsider his decision not to order an investigation of alleged corruption in the New York City Administration. Mr. Waldman spoke at a picnic of trades union, Socialist and fraternal organizations in Ulmer Park, Brooklyn.

Characterizing the investigation being conducted by Commissioner of Accounts James A. Higgins at the order of Mayor Walker as a "whitewashing plan," Mr. Waldman declared that Governor Roosevelt's refusal to order a real investigation would make the issue of corruption an important one in the coming State campaign and thereby obscure other issues of equal importance, such as unemployment, public utilities and water power.

Sees Agreement With Tammany.

Mr. Waldman also asserted that Governor Roosevelt's letter to the Republican legislative leaders, refusing to call a special session of the Legislature on the ground that charges of official misconduct were under investigation already by Commissioner Higgins, was made public on the same day Mayor Walker announced the Commissioner of Accounts had been directed to make an investigation. Mr. Waldman contended that this proved that the Governor and the Tammany leaders had decided jointly on the Higgins investigation as a method of escape from a State investigation.

"The Governor's letter, dated July 19, is as interesting for what it reveals as for what it conceals," Mr. Waldman said. "A careful reading of it discloses that it is not the 'State paper' which his friends consider it to be, but the pettifogging argument of a special pleader.

"Of the two alternatives, one, to order an investigation and offend the Tammany-McCooey machine, and the other, not to order one and offend the decent citizenry of our community, the Governor seems to have chosen the second alternative. I am in no position to say whether his choice is good politics or not. I am supremely certain, however, that it is bad public morality. Whatever its immediate effect, the Governor in later years will be ashamed of his failure to act when it was his clear duty to act and thereby hearten those elements in our population who, without any axes to grind, are anxious for honest government in our city and State.

Charges Grafters Are Aided.

"The whole tone of the Governor's letter will rather aid the common grafters and faithless public servants preying upon a helpless public. With the Governor a party to the proceeding, the cynical and brazen Tammany-McCooey machine of our city will set about to whitewash itself. It will do more, since its effect will be to intimidate and harrass complainants. It will shut up citizens with a real grievance, citizens who have been compelled while in the ordinary pursuit of their business or in civil life to pay tribute. The same forces and the same fears that compel law-abiding citizens to submit to and participate in corrupt practices will cast the pall of fear on the victims and in that way prevent a real investigation.

"It is idle chatter, unworthy of the Governor of a great State, to say, as Governor Roosevelt does, that an investigation by the Legislature or through a State agency would be justified 'whenever it had become apparent that the investigation is not as complete and as searching as it should be.' When does a local investigation become complete or searching? How will any one know whether the local investigation is complete or searching?"

Mr. Waldman added that there had been no local investigation by the Commissioner of Accounts of the Board of Standards and Appeals or of the payment of a $250,000 fee for former County Judge W. Bernard Vause until after the disclosure of corruption by other agencies.

Quoting a statement in Governor Roosevelt's letter that "action by the Governor or the Legislature to investigate local government is proper when and if the local investigating machinery fails to function," Mr. Waldman declared that this constituted an admission that the demand of the Socialist party for a State investigation was proper and sound.

Ameli Offers Half of All Fines to Informers In New Drive on Litterers of Coast Waters

United States Attorney Howard W. Ameli of Brooklyn, through his assistant, Martin Neumann, announced yesterday a renewed effort to keep Federal waters around New York free from litter and offered a 50 per cent commission on the fines imposed to persons who give information leading to the conviction of any one throwing rubbish into the harbor.

Mr. Neumann has received reports that the waterfront near the Rockaways is unusually dirty this year, and also that many big steamships have been seen recently leaving the harbor, their decks piled with rubbish which evidently was intended to be dumped into the ocean soon after getting out of sight of land.

"The only means through which big ship companies can expect leniency," said Mr. Neumann, "is by ordering their captains to dump waste matter at least twenty-five miles or more at sea."

The law provides fines ranging from $250 to $2,500 for dumping foreign matter into Federal waters, with the alternative of from thirty days to a year in jail.

Mr. Neumann declared that he was anxious to obtain the cooperation of New York City and the States of New York, New Jersey and Connecticut in clearing up the waters, because there are only two inspectors for about 1,000 miles of waterfront reaching from Albany to New London, Conn.

Efforts to clean up beaches have not been altogether successful, perhaps because the "commission" lure was not held out, it was said. Believing that most of the litter along New York beach fronts is left there by careless picnickers, Dr. Philip I. Nash, president of the Coney Island Chamber of Commerce, started a clean-up campaign about a week ago and a force of thirty extra men was assigned by the Street Cleaning Department to patrol the waterfront at Coney Island.

Several summonses were issued to persons found tossing bottles on the beach, but the anti-litter patrol was unable to cope successfully with the situation. Sanitary Commissioner Charles S. Hand finally announced that he had abandoned hope of clearing the shorefront of broken glass and rubbish this year, and added that during the remainder of the Summer he would give his attention to "educating" the populace in the proper disposal of litter.

Meanwhile, at Coney Island, Dr. Nash predicts that unless the situation is remedied last year's record of 6,111 cases of cut feet caused by broken glass on the beach and treated at Coney Island Hospital will be eclipsed this season.

At Dr. Nash's request, Borough President Hesterberg has placed additional signs along the beach urging the public to put all litter in cans provided for the purpose, and has also augmented the number of rubbish cans. But in most cases, it was said, the new warning signs have been totally ignored and the new rubbish cans unnoticed.

CHAIR-SITTING FIGHT SUBSIDES ON BEACH

But Objectors Plan Action as Coney Island Police Ignore Defiance of Ban.

SCHANZER TO TEST LAW

Brooklyn Republicans to Call for Mass Protest—Chamber Backs Enforcement of Ordinance.

Chair-sitting on the Coney Island beach stopped being an exciting skirmish with the law yesterday and resumed its status as a rather dull occupation requiring no more than normal courage and imagination. The police detail went back to its normal routine of chasing peddlers and finding lost children.

During the day a new champion took up the fight against the chair barons who are seeking to keep privately owned furniture off the beach. He was Albert D. Schanzer, Democratic Assemblyman from Brighton Beach, who announced he would submit a brief to Corporation Counsel Hilly tomorrow, showing by statute and precedence that it is illegal to ban chairs from a public beach.

Meanwhile the Brooklyn Republican organization declared a fight to regain the public's lost sitting privilege, and Borough President Hesterberg awaited a report from Mr. Hilly on the legality of the old anti-chair ordinance. This will not be ready until tomorrow, assuring the week-end crowds at least a three-day truce before the police again take up the cudgel or definitely abandon it.

Mass Protest Planned.

Brooklyn Republicans plan a mass protest meeting at Coney Island some night this week, at which resolutions will be proposed and a petition to various officials suggested. Party members announced that the twenty lawyers retained to defend the chair-sitting violators will continue to be available.

In the morning several Coney Island business men visited Police Captain John J. Gillen to urge an earlier demand from concessionaires that the ban on chairs be extended to bathing suits. Captain Gillen declined to act, and up to last night it did not constitute a misdemeanor to don one's bathing suit at home, walk to the beach with a bathrobe and save the price of a hired suit and locker.

Clerks in Assemblyman Schanzer's Manhattan law office spent the day briefing the case against the seven-year-old ordinance. He said he would cite, among others, one case in the Manhattan Supreme Court several years ago when the court is said to have held that it was not criminal to park one's chair under a tree in Central Park.

Mr. Schanzer will contend, he said, that Coney Island is publicly owned land set apart by the city for the use of the public, and therefore it comes under the same category as Central Park. The Assemblyman said he would appear in Coney Island Court on Aug. 6, when twenty sitters are to be tried before Magistrate Hershfield for breaking the law.

For the first time since the police began to enforce the ordinance on Tuesday, Dr. Philip I. Nash, president of the Coney Island Chamber of Commerce and leader of the anti-litter crusade which preceded the battle of the chairs, issued a statement condemning violators of the ordinance and backing police enforcement.

Chamber to Back Enforcement.

Dr. Nash said the chamber would back the Borough President in any action he took, but that while the law remains on the books strict enforcement would be asked. Five cents, he said, is not too much to pay for the privilege of hiring a chair, pointing out that the law was at least partly intended to keep the beach from being flooded with furniture.

It was revealed yesterday that the M. and C. Corporation, which holds the chair concession, was formed in 1928 under the leadership of John R. Collins, 3,415 East Fourth Street; Frank J. Collins of the same address, Alexander Meyers of 1,663 Ocean Parkway and Malvin B. Mariash of 1,623 Avenue R, all of Brooklyn.

Meyers, it was learned, came from Boston to operate the beach chair concession in 1924, bidding $45,000 for the privilege. He broke into the chair-renting business in 1915 and before coming to Coney Island had operated with profit at Revere Beach, Nantasket, Lynn Beach, Nahant and Florida.

Newspaper clippings revealed that some months after getting the Coney concession he gave up his other concessions and granted interviews, in which he was reported as saying that the chair-renting business on Coney Island had made him a rich man. The M. & O. Corporation now pays $21,000 annually for the concession.

SHOT DEFYING HOLD-UP.

Wallace Minneman, 50 years old, proprietor of a shoe store at 15 Fordham Road, a busy thoroughfare in the Bronx, was shot through the abdomen and seriously wounded last night when he refused to turn over the money in his store to a hold-up man.

NOISE VIGILANTES WILL BE PERMANENT

Abatement Board Head Says 110 Have Been So Successful That Drive Will Be Widened.

'SNOOPING' IS BARRED

Listeners Will Merely Report the Violators—Silencing of New Trolley Bells Is Next Step.

New York's anti-noise vigilantes have come to stay, at least until some of the city's more outstanding cacophonies have been hushed, it was learned yesterday. Edward F. Brown, director of the Noise Abatement Commission, said the work of 110 volunteer members of its vigilance squad sent out to listen for violations of the city ordinance that forbids the use of loud-speakers on the streets or in doorways or windows opening on the sidewalk had been so highly successful that the idea is soon to be used in a larger and more comprehensive drive.

The use of vigilantes will have a large part in the plan to be announced at the end of this week, he said, for a drive on such evils as loud-speakers in the home, unnecessarily noisy excavation work, unnecessary blowing of automobile horns, loose loads on trucks and loose trucks that bang and rattle because they need tightening up.

Many more volunteers than the number engaged in the present drive will be enrolled, he said, and, like the first group, they will have no authority. They will not approach violators, but merely observe and report to the police or the commission.

"We are opposed to snooping and snoopers," Mr. Brown said, "and these people are not in any sense snoopers or detectives. They are people who are willing to do something to make this a quieter city, and are merely observers and reporters."

The present group, which began last Friday to hunt noisy radio stores without pay and in eight-hour day or evening shifts, will continue on full time through Thursday, Mr. Brown said. After that they will still watch for offenders while going about on their private business. But the plan has already proved itself a complete success, he said, for the law is pretty nearly entirely observed today, and there will, I believe, be no violators at all by the middle of next week."

While all this is going on, Mr. Brown said, the commission is proceeding in an effort to eliminate the noise of the new bells on certain street cars, "next to police sirens the loudest noise in the city."

The commission, he asserted, has already written to the street car companies in an endeavor to enlist their cooperation. He is hopeful in this matter, he said, because of the cooperation of the I. R. T. in silencing all of its subway turnstiles. He hoped the street car companies would take the same attitude. Meanwhile, he added, the commission is making a laboratory study of the sound of the new bells.

"We have received hundreds of complaints about these bells," he declared. "And the vicious thing is that cars using them are invariably run through the quieter residential sections of Brooklyn and Queens. They are not so bad in Manhattan, because other noises still rather minimize their effect."

FILES PARDON PLEA IN COEUR D'ALENE

Harry Orchard, Lifer Sentenced for Killing Idaho Governor in 1905, Seeks Freedom.

BOISE, Idaho, July 26 (AP).—Harry Orchard, serving a life prison sentence for the assassination of Governor Frank Steunerberg in 1905, during labor troubles in the Coeur d'Alene mining district, today made application for parole.

Orchard turned State's evidence against three officers of the then powerful Western Federation of Miners, accused of conspiracy in the assassination, but the other defendants were acquitted. They included William (Big Bill) Haywood, Charles Moyer and George Pettibone.

Governor Steunenberg was killed by a bomb which exploded when he opened a gate at his home. During the labor trouble several smelting plants were burned and many lives were lost in serious and prolonged rioting. Martial law finally was proclaimed and the military ended the disturbance.

Orchard is 63 years old and has spent nearly a quarter of a century in the penitentiary. Since incarceration he has written a book containing not only a long confession of the Steunenberg affair, but a detailed record of previous crimes, including several murders, mine and railroad bombings, principally in Idaho.

The next meeting of the Board of Pardons will be in September, when Orchard's case will be considered.

QUITS INDIA AID GROUP.

Wilbur Is Tenth to Resign From Tuberculosis Association.

WASHINGTON, July 26 (AP).—Secretary Wilbur today telegraphed from the West his resignation as a member of the committee formed here to aid the Tuberculosis Association of Bengal, India. The Interior Secretary's resignation was the tenth to be received in recent days.

Other resignations include those of Sir Ronald Lindsay, British Ambassador; Senators Capper and Copeland, Dr. Hugh Cummings, Surgeon General, and Mrs. E. R. Grant, chairman.

The virtual collapse of the committee designed to aid about 1,000,000 sufferers from tuberculosis in Bengal resulted from differences over the committee's policy.

It was unofficially stated that until Sir Francis Stanley Jackson, Governor General of Bengal, sends a new representative of the work here the resigned members will not resume their work.

RACKETEER IS KILLED.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, July 26 (AP).—Jim Porello, one of the leaders in the corn sugar racket here, died in a hospital this evening several hours after he was shot down by gunmen in renewal of the sugar war which has brought numerous deaths in recent years. His assailant escaped.

POLICEMAN IS SHOT AS HE RAIDS A GANG

Critically Wounded by Men Fleeing Alleged Headquarters of Policy Game.

ANSWERS HOLD-UP ALARM

Empties Pistol at Negroes Who Leap Out Windows of West 63d Street Tenement.

Patrolman Dominick Caviglia of the West Sixty-eighth Street station was shot through the abdomen and critically wounded last night when he surprised what is believed to have been a policy game pay-off headquarters in an apartment in the third floor rear of a tenement house at 228 West Sixty-third Street.

Caviglia was called to the tenement in the Negro section known as San Juan Hill by a Negro woman, who told him a hold-up was in progress. As he opened the door of the apartment he saw about ten men at a table engaged in a heated argument.

The patrolman carried his service pistol in his hand. Leveling it at the group, he ordered them to throw up their hands. But instead of obeying they scrambled for the windows. At least two of them, drawing pistols from their pockets, opened fire on Caviglia. He returned the fire until his pistol was empty and then he collapsed from the wound in his abdomen.

Whether any of his assailants were wounded is not known. They fled through the windows across adjoining roofs and escaped. Residents in the house, among them Steve Demertvis of 1,536 St. Nicholas Avenue, who runs a grocery store on the ground floor, telephoned news of the shooting to the police station.

A few moments later an automobile filled with detectives arrived at the tenement and found its occupants barricaded behind their doors. Caviglia, semi-conscious, lay on the floor just inside the apartment. He was able to give only the briefest details of the affair before he lost consciousness. An ambulance took him to Roosevelt Hospital. Physicians there said his condition was critical.

With the arrival of the detectives residents of the house gained more confidence and opened their doors. Some told the police that they believed the third floor rear apartment served as a headquarters for a policy game and that Saturday was pay-off night. A few expressed the opinion that a gang of hold-up men, knowing of the pay-off, had tried to hold up the policy headquarters. Others, however, were of the opinion that a quarrel over the pay-off had started all the trouble. Just before Caviglia reached the house, they said, they heard shouts, curses and the sound of blows coming from the apartment.

The detectives rounded up about five Negroes and took them to headquarters for questioning. A large crowd had collected outside the tenement as Caviglia was carried from the house. Many Negroes in the crowd expressed surprise that Caviglia had been shot.

open, giving their tents to women and children. Some even gave their tunics and other articles of clothing to the half-naked peasants, that they might keep warm during the bitterly cold and rainy nights.

In Aquilonia yesterday the King warmly shook by hand and congratulated Corporal Deangelis of the Army Medical Corps, who had driven a motor ambulance continuously without rest for sixty hours, rushing injured persons to hospital at Potenza. The soldiers constantly risk their lives amid the tottering ruins in order to save the lives of persons trapped there.

Touching also is the prompt way in which the whole of Italy has rallied round the stricken region with offers of help. In Bisaccia the King watched a squad of men at work who had come all the way from Milan.

Firemen from Rome are at work in Vallata. Between Melfi and Lacedonia the King saw motorbuses from Rome taking orphaned children off to homes in the capital. So numerous have been the offers of help, indeed, that some are more embarrassing than useful and the authorities have been obliged to refuse the vast majority.

Death List Rises to 2,142.

According to official statistics, the total list of dead up to 8 o'clock last night amounted to 2,142, while the injured numbered 4,551. The communiqué added, however, that these figures were liable to be increased with the progress of the rescue work amid the ruins.

The communiqué said the number of houses destroyed had not yet been finally ascertained, but that it would certainly be larger than previous estimates. Yesterday's communiqué put the total number of houses totally destroyed at 3,188 and the partly destroyed at 2,757.

That the final losses will be higher than is indicated by the official figures is certain because details are still lacking from several isolated villages.

Today, for instance, the first messengers arrived from Monteverde, a small village among the Apennines. They urgently pleaded for help, describing the terrible situation in their village, which, they said, was completely cut off from the outer world and was in desperate need of food, water and medical supplies. They said most of the village had been destroyed and that there were many dead. The messengers received a sympathetic hearing from the Duchess of Aosta, as a result of which the first rescue party, composed of infantry and Fascist militia, was dispatched with the most urgently needed supplies.

The relief party was obliged to go on foot over the fields because the roads are impassable. Military engineers, however, are hard at work repairing the roads and it is hoped motor trucks will soon be able to make the trip to Monteverde.

Lacedonia today still heads the list of towns which suffered the most damage. Reports from there say 700 bodies have been extracted from the wreckage so far. Some of the smaller places where the toll has not been exceptionally heavy nevertheless suffered very extensive material damage. For instance, at Accadia 850 houses are uninhabitable and must be demolished. At Coli there are 500 such houses.

This work is being done by army engineers with the utmost dispatch as the insecure walls are constantly threatening to fall and form a permanent source of danger to the motor trucks which must pass through the village streets to the neighboring points.

In many areas the peasants returned to work today in the fields as the crops are now ripe for the harvest. The crops on the whole suffered very little, but much livestock was killed.

These comparatively happy conditions in the Melfi district, however, are not duplicated everywhere else. The Province of Avellino, which must rely on road transport for the greater part of its communications with Naples, is still swamped with injured persons waiting to be taken to hospitals, and the shortage of supplies continues there.

Nor can the transportation of supplies be speeded up because the roads already have more traffic than they can hold. The authorities have decided that every one who has relatives or friends elsewhere who are willing to afford temporary hospitality must move out of the district. They will be moved out as soon as the transportation of the injured has been completed.

Similar action has been taken by the authorities in Melfi, who hope within a few days to send 14,000 people out of their district, thus lessening the number of mouths to be fed. This evacuation is already proceeding.

Meanwhile food tickets are being distributed to all inhabitants in the stricken zones.

Despite the improved conditions, much urgent work remains to be done in all districts. The most urgent requirement is burial of the dead. So the practice of digging individual graves has been abandoned for the more expeditious method of mass burials as essential to avoid epidemics.

Water supply also represents a grave problem in the majority of districts. At present, water is still arriving in tank cars from neighboring cities, but army engineers are at work on aqueducts with considerable home of having them in working order again within a few days.

Food and other supplies also must still be sent from the outside. Those supplies which escaped destruction were soon consumed. Great efforts are being concentrated on improving communications. Army engineers are busy repairing and clearing wreckage from the roads, with the double purpose of facilitating the moving of persons out of and supplies into the damaged areas and of permitting rescuers to reach isolated villages, many of which are believed to be sorely in need of help.

Plenty of Tents for Homeless.

There is plenty of other work, though of a less urgent nature, which is about to be undertaken now. In the first place it is necessary to find suitable shelter for all the homeless. A sufficient number of army tents has now been sent to the scene to house all the homeless, who will thus be spared the suffering of the first days, when they were obliged to sleep in the open under a terrible downpour of rain, but obviously something more permanent must be provided with all possible dispatch. Later still it will be necessary to rebuild the destroyed homes.

Reconstruction plans already are under way, but they are now awaiting the meeting next Tuesday of the Cabinet Council, when final decisions will be made by the Central Government. In any case, it is hoped to have sufficient houses rebuilt to shelter the whole population before next Winter.

It is also necessary to provide sheds or barns for the crops which are now about to be harvested and which otherwise would be wasted.

The populace of the stricken zones have been touched by the unanimous sympathy showered upon them from all parts of the civilized world. The first day on which the telegraph office at Potenza opened for private messages 200,000 telegrams were received. Many came from the United States where many of the inhabitants have relatives. One telegram was received from a German who was a prisoner of war at Potenza during the World War. He expressed horror at the disaster which had befallen the people whom he had learned to love.

Extra Priests to Hold Services.

NAPLES, Italy, July 26 (AP).—King Victor Emmanuel concluded one of the most sorrowful pilgrimages of his thirty years' reign tonight.

So sweeping was the effect of the earthquakes that tomorrow morning will see fully half of the houses of worship in the region either destroyed or rendered too dangerous for congregations to enter.

Extra masses will be said or sung in the religious edifices still standing and solid to bring comfort to the pious village folk who wish to offer thanks for their escape from the tremor's wrath, and who, above all, wish to pray for the repose of the souls of their beloved ones.

The local clergy within the earthquake area will not suffice to read all the masses requested. There has, therefore, been a great marshaling of priests from the non-stricken adjoining regions.

The opening of the telegraph wires to the general public brought an avalanche of messages from distracted relatives. During the first days after the quake the government had reserved the telegraph lines to official messages having to do with relief work.

Not only from other parts of Italy, but also from North and South America, thousands of anxious relatives and friends inquired about the fate of their loved ones.

Papal Envoy Gets Data in Area.

BENEVENTO, Italy, July 26 (AP).—Mgr. Chiapetta, the Pope's special envoy, today arrived in the earthquake zone, where he was received by the civil and military authorities.

Mgr. Chiapetta, with his assistants, at once began compiling a list of missing clergy and information regarding damage to church property.

The papal envoy traveled by motor car from Vatican City and pursued his journey through the stricken localities today by that means. He expressed appreciation of the work of the physicians and nursing nuns as he went through the tent city near here.

Hut Cities Will Be Built.

ROME, July 25 (AP).—Signor Crollalanza's report to Premier Mussolini said that in view of the altitude of several ruined villages and the relatively short time in which Winter would be upon the mountain territory, he had arranged in the districts badly damaged for the erection of temporary hut cities.

The government announcement today also said that many of the local bakeries in the quake zone were resuming operations so that the rationing problem from now on would be less serious.

Since Wednesday's earthquake many people in the affected zone of Southern Italy have been suffering from nausea, which is believed due partly to nervousness. The slight shocks Thursday and Friday have contributed to this.

Such sickness has been noted much less in Naples, Amalfi and Sorrento on the coast, which lie in the regular tourist path and were little affected by the shocks, but common in the mountain towns inland.

AMERICANS SAFE IN NAPLES.

But Hammonton, N. J., Contractor and Son Have Not Been Heard From

Word has been received here from Italy that the hotels along the waterfront in Naples are unharmed by the recent earthquakes in that region. When tremors occur, they usually result in damage only to those structures which are built on the hillsides, and Americans in Naples report that although they felt the quakes they experienced no discomfort.

HAMMONTON, N. J., July 26.—Friends and relatives of Michael Volpe, a contractor, and his son, Donald, a Hammonton High School senior, football captain and a basketball star, were disturbed today at their failure to send word regarding their safety after the recent earthquake in Italy.

The two left to visit relatives in Italy on June 22. They were last heard from July 9, when a letter from them said they were at Pollica, six miles from Naples, in the earthquake area. Mrs. Anna Volpe and their daughter, Evelyn, 13, cabled the father and son yesterday, but received no reply.

ELIZABETH, N. J., July 26.—A gift of $500 for the relief of the sufferers in the Italian earthquake was voted today by the Vallatese Association, at a special meeting. The city of Vallata, from which ancestors of the club's members came to this country, is in the zone devastated by the earthquake.

EARTH SHOCKS ALARM EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

People of German and Bulgarian Towns in Panic—Tremors Recorded in St. Louis.

DUISBURG-ALTSTADEN, Germany, July 26 (AP).—The populace of this town was thrown into a panic by an earthquake here this forenoon which rocked furniture and shook pictures from walls. The people ran into the streets, fearing a disaster, but no casualties were reported.

SOFIA, Bulgaria, July 26 (AP).—Numerous earth shocks were felt throughout the seismic region of Bulgaria today. No damage was reported, but the populace of several country villages were alarmed.

The shocks were felt at intervals of nearly an hour and were accompanied by underground rumblings.

ST. LOUIS, July 26 (AP).—An earthquake of moderate intensity was recorded on seismographs at St. Louis University yesterday afternoon, Father Joliet reported today. It began at 3:39:59 P. M. and the second phase was at 3:45:26. The distance indicated was 1,620 miles from St. Louis, but the direction was not determined.

Argentine, Chilean and Mexican Officials Express Sympathy.

ROME, July 26 (AP).—The Ambassadors of Argentina and Chile and the Mexican Chargé d'Affaires today called at the Italian Foreign Office to express their countries' sympathy for the earthquake sufferers.

MEXICO CITY, July 26 (AP).—President Ortiz Rubio today instructed the Mexican Minister at Rome to offer condolences in the Italian earthquake disaster.

RIO DE JANEIRO, July 26 (AP).—The Chamber of Deputies has adopted a resolution of sympathy for the Italian people stricken by the earthquake Wednesday.

WARD HEARS ATTACK ON TICKET LEAGUE

Weighs Plea to Sue Members of Board to Curb Speculators Under Anti-Trust Law.

IS SILENT ON COMPLAINT

"Outside" Brokers Charge Theatre Men Get Illegal Profits From Operation of Plan.

Hamilton Ward, State Attorney General, was asked yesterday to bring proceedings in the Supreme Court here to dissolve the League of New York Theatres, Inc., recently organized to curb speculation in theatre tickets. The league is charged by outside brokers with being a monopoly operating in restraint of trade and with violating the State general business and corporation law. The charges against the league, which has recently organized to curb speculation by selling the tickets at the box-offices or through accredited brokers who are permitted to add a service charge of seventy-five cents for each ticket, were made to Mr. Ward at a conference in the Attorney General's offices, 51 Chambers Street.

The complaint was made by Bernard H. Sandler and William R. Willcox, attorneys for twenty-three brokers who assert they are not on the league's accredited list and are unable to obtain tickets for attractions in the league theatres.

After listening to the two attorneys Mr. Ward announced he would take the complaint under advisement and make known his decision later. He requested the attorneys not to discuss the complaint. Mr. Ward also declined to make any comment on the request for dissolution proceedings, but later issued a statement in which he declared that if it is the desire of those in the controversy to protect the public, the solution would be to sell theatre tickets at box offices at regular prices.

Ward Issues Statement.

Mr. Ward's statement said:

"In the matter of the League of New York Theatres, Inc., the Attorney General will follow the usual practice of making inquiry into any complaint filed with him as to the legality of any agreement alleged to be a violation of the general business law and the general corporation law.

"Apart from any matter of law, however, the question naturally occurs to any one approaching the subject as a comparative newcomer, why, if the theatre managers really desire to protect the public, they do not cooperate and have tickets sold at the theatre box-offices at regular prices and nowhere else. This would seem a simple solution in the interests of fair play to the public."

Although Mr. Ward did not want any information made public regarding his discussion yesterday with counsel for the complainants, it became known that he was urged to bring the dissolution proceedings on the ground that the existing monopoly would drive out of business the "unaccredited" agencies who have an investment of more than $500,000 and employ more than 150 persons.

Mr. Ward reviewed a brief in which citations were given to substantiate the fact that the handling of the theatre tickets by the sixteen accredited brokers is a monopoly. As to the violation of the business law, attention was called to the fact that the league was organized as a membership corporation "and as such cannot engage in business for pecuniary profit."

Mr. Ward was informed "an investigation of the affairs of the league will disclose that its members are required to pay to the league 1 per cent of the gross amount of money realized by these theatres on sales of its tickets through said sixteen accredited agencies."

Charge Bureau Gets Profit.

Mr. Ward was told the organization is conducting business at a profit. "Numerous so-called credit agencies organized in various industries, so-called benevolent associations, organized in industries and businesses, all operating on the same business on which the league is constructed, have all been construed as operating for pecuniary profit and have been dissolved in proceedings instituted for that purpose by the Attorney General," the complaint declared.

"The facts assumed here can be readily verified," it continued, "and will readily disclose that the league is usurping the functions of a stock corporation; is operating for a pecuniary profit, has exceeded its corporate powers and is operating in contravention to the laws of this State."

The fact that former Governor Smith is a member of the Board of Governors of the league caused interest in the appearance of Mr. Willcox as counsel with Mr. Sandler, both opposing the league. Mr. Willcox is well known in politics, having been chairman of the Republican National Committee from 1916 to 1918, postmaster of New York City from 1905 to 1907 and chairman of the Public Service Committee from 1907 to 1913. He managed the campaign of Charles Evans Hughes for the Presidency.

FIRE CHIEF INJURED IN BROOKLYN CRASH

Three Others Slightly Hurt When Traffic Lights Confuse Driver of Private Car.

A misunderstanding of traffic signals, the police said, caused an accident at Seventy-ninth Street and Fourteenth Avenue, Brooklyn, yesterday afternoon, in which a Fire Department automobile and a private car were wrecked and four persons were injured slightly.

Battalion Chief John Hederman, with his driver, Earl Sterling, returning from a small fire at 8,001 Fort Hamilton Parkway, were driving east on Seventy-ninth Street. Dominick Calone, and his wife, Anna, of 6,406 Fourteenth Avenue, driving north along that thoroughfare, apparently became confused by the traffic lights and crashed into the Fire Department car, the police of the Bath Beach station said after an investigation.

Both automobiles were damaged almost beyond repair. At first it was feared that someone had been killed and ambulances were summoned from Harbor and Shore Road Hospitals. Doctors who responded said that Chief Hederman, Sterling and Calone had escaped with no more serious injury than minor cuts and bruises while Mrs. Calone, who is 20 years old, suffered only from hysteria. All were able to go home.

Chief Hederman, who is in command of the Forty-eighth Battalion, is 45 years old and lives at 444 Eighty-third Street, Brooklyn. Sterling is 32 and lives at 354 East Fifty-fourth Street, in that borough.

FORD CHIEF ALTERS STATEMENT ON REDS

Sorenson Tells Congressional Committee in Detroit He Was Misinterpreted Here.

APPROVES ROOT SUGGESTION

Polanski Links Michigan and Ohio Communists With Russia by Letters Seized in Raid.

Special to The New York Times.

DETROIT, July 26.—Charles E. Sorenson, personal representative of Henry Ford, was a witness today before the Congressional committee investigating activities of Communists in the Detroit area.

Representative Hamilton Fish Jr. of New York, chairman of the committee, requested Mr. Sorenson's attendance, as considerable testimony had been taken in previous sessions bearing on the presence of Communists in the Ford plants.

"We have in our plant," Mr. Sorenson stated, "a number of Russians who are studying our production methods. Our relations with the Soviet Government have been entirely satisfactory and we are not ashamed of our association."

The committee questioned Mr. Sorenson particularly about a statement he was quoted as having made upon his arrival in New York from Russia July 16 that he regarded as futile the proposal of Elihu Root to establish a branch of the Department of Justice for the investigation of radical activities.

He told the committee that the statement, while correct in the main, had been so "embellished" that it did not correctly convey what he had in mind. He believed, he said, in a change in the law to provide the Department of Justice with the authority to combat Red activities.

He stood by that part of his statement which quoted him as declaring that "if our industries are as sound as they are advertised to be, the country has little to fear from the agitation of Reds who are only seeking to bring their standard of living up to our own levels."

The Ford Motor Company, the witness declared, has a private police force which checks up on the activities of the workers in the plant, but the company never has had trouble with the Communists.

Shown samples of Communist propaganda distributed among Ford workers, Mr. Sorensen said "I wish some way might be found to prevent it," but he said that it had caused no particular trouble.

As to testimony that the Ford company had brought about the flooding of the city with job-seekers through announcements that workers were wanted, Mr. Sorensen said that arose through a misconception.

"The newspapers," he declared, "broadcast the fact that we are taking on men and publication of the news brings hordes of job-hunters to the city. The same thing happens in every factory in Detroit."

Jacob Polanski, former agent of the Department of Justice, now special representative of the Metal Trades Association, furnished the committee with a large number of Communist documents, the most important of which were letters taken from Earl Brower, second in command to William Z. Foster, head of the Communist trade union activities in America, by the Detroit police in May.

These letters and cablegrams were sent to Brower from the Communist International and the Soviet Government. They contained evidence of the close cooperation between the party in America and the Russian Government. They contained references to funds being sent to America and instructions as to how demonstrations should be conducted.

The witness named a dozen automobile plants in which he said Communist papers were published and distributed and presented several of the papers in evidence. The circulation of each paper he estimated at from 2,000 to 20,000. The Ford Worker, he said, has a circulation of 20,000 among Ford employes.

MAY EXTEND EMBARGO ON SOVIET PRODUCTS

Treasury Announces Study of Shipments of Manganese, Coal and Timber.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Apparently undismayed by the implied threat of M. Litvinoff, new Soviet Minister of Foreign Affairs, to reduce or cut off entirely Russian purchases in the United States, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman announced today that, beginning Monday, he would begin an examination of Russian manganese, ore, coal and timber shipments to this country, with the object of determining whether the articles were produced or handled by convict labor.

The embargo applied yesterday against Russian pulpwood would be extended to these other articles if the investigation showed that they were convict-labor goods, it was indicated.

M. Litvinoff yesterday at Moscow issued a warning to all countries imposing obstacles to the admission of Soviet products that the Soviet Government might sharply reduce or even stop its purchases in such countries.

Mr. Lowman's announcement with respect to manganese ore follows charges made in a letter to Representative Hamilton Fish Jr. by C. Carson Adkerson, president of the American Manganese Producers' Association, that the American manganese ore industry was being paralyzed through dumping of Russian manganese in this country.

It was intimated at the Treasury Department that an investigator may be sent to Russia to make inquiry into labor conditions in the timber, manganese and coal industries, despite the decision of Secretary Stimson recently, after a conference with Secretary Mellon, that it was inadvisable to send an official investigator to Russia.

Police to Watch Red Rally Friday.

Police Commissioner Mulrooney said yesterday that an adequate force would be assigned to watch the Communist demonstration scheduled for Union Square next Friday at 5 P. M. He said that so far the Communist party had not notified him officially of the proposed meeting.

SOVIET CONDEMNS RED INQUIRY HERE

Calls the Fish Investigation Interference With Affairs of Another Country.

By WALTER DURANTY.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, July 26.—The Fish committee's examination of Bogdanov and other Amtorg officials was made known to the Russian public only today by the publication of long cablegrams from New York under indignant headlines.

The cables were dated July 22, 23 and 24, but perhaps the earliest was delayed in transmission, as the news seems to have reached officials of the departments concerned only on the 24th. Yesterday, the 25th, Foreign Commissar Litvinoff in his first public statment to the foreign press, made no allusion to the subject whatever and it was only a question from THE NEW YORK TIMES correspondent which drew from the new commissar a strongly expressed opinion on the subject. So closely has the secret been kept that this was the first intimation to the majority of those present that the Fish committee had extended its activities beyond the investigation of alleged Communist interference in industrial disputes or "red pioneer menace" in the New York public schools.

The delayed—or suppressed—news, when it finally was published, roused great indignation here. Pravda runs a headline as follows: "Brutally insolent provocation of American Diehards." Izvestia's caption was "Session of the Congressional committee of the United States perverted into foul anti-Soviet comedy," and other papers speak of "Fascist investigation" or "Congressional inquiry becomes anti-Soviet demonstration."

Izvestia alone prints editorial comment which is full of uncomplimentary phrases like "insolent stupidity—brutal irrelevance—baseless fabrication—third-degree methods." Somewhat unexpectedly the main point made by Izvestia is that the substance, form and manner of Bogdanov's cross-examination constitutes "manifest and impermissible interference in foreign affairs of another country." Izvestia then continues: "In its endeavor by the crudest means to brand Amtorg as conducting political activities in America, the Fish commission—official body of the United States—itself gives a flagrant example of unwarranted infraction of international rights."

Izvestia goes on to repeat Bogdanov's own statement about the complete baselessness of accusations against the Amtorg and his hint that such accusations, unless disavowed, tend to make business between the Amtorg and American firms impossible in the future. That question, says Izvestia, must be decided by the American business world. Izvestia concludes that "all this clumsily staged anti-Soviet demonstration is aimed at a rupture of economic relations between the two greatest States of the world in the interest of a smalla small, limited group."

Izvestia also publishes a cable from New York stating that two members of the Fish committee, Representatives Bachman of West Virginia and Nelson of Maine, are interested in a campaign to prevent importation of Soviet coal and timber.

"It is for New York and Washington to decide whether the Fish committee should be allowed to continue in the same spirit or whether limits should be put to such unheard-of conduct by a governmental commission, which can only lead to the disruption of Soviet-American trade and serious loss to the industrial and financial world of the United States. New York and Washington must judge whether such a development of events corresponds to American interests."

SOVIET GOLD ACTION TO BEGIN IN BERLIN

Hearings to Open This Week on Ownership of $5,000,000 Claimed by France.

BANK HERE IS DEFENDANT

Testimony to Be Taken in Germany Because Russian Witnesses Cannot Appear Here.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, July 26.—Another step toward determining the ownership of $5,000,000 worth of gold bars which the Russian State Bank shipped to the Chase National Bank and the Equitable Trust Company in New York in March, 1928, and which was promptly claimed by a replevin action by the Bank of France as being the same gold bars which the Soviet "stole" from the former Russian Imperial Bank, where it was on deposit to the credit of the Bank of France, will be taken here next week before Rogers Lamont, New York lawyer, who has been appointed commissioner for the Federal Court of the Southern District of New York.

Fourteen Russians, mostly employes of the Gosbank (the State bank of Soviet Russia) at Moscow, will arrive here Monday prepared to give evidence that none of those gold bars which were shipped to New York were the ones which the Bank of France placed on deposit at St. Petersburg in 1915 and 1916. They are being called by the Chase National Bank, which will be represented by George Hamlin of the New York law firm of Rushmore, Bisbie & Stern and probably by ex-Governor Nathan L. Miller of New York.

The evidence is to be taken here because the witnesses cannot go to the United States. Maurice Leon of Evarts, Choate, Sherman & Leon, New York, who are the American representatives of the Bank of France, will represent the plaintiff.

It is understood the Bank of France must establish that at least some of those gold bars are the originals in order to substantiate the replevin proceedings against the Chase National Bank. The French institution is seeking to hold the Chase National responsible for the value of the gold bars, since the latter allowed the bars to be withdrawn and shipped to Germany after the Bank of France had filed its replevin suit.

The gold was returned to Europe on a German liner in April, 1928. There were dramatic moments when it appeared that France intended to seize the liner in the English Channel and remove the gold. Some uncertainty appears to exist as to where the gold is now, but this does not interest the Bank of France.

Among the intricate legal questions involved is the French claim that the Soviet is not a government—which could not be proceeded against in the courts—but merely a "régime," though it appears that it must also prove that the Soviet is enough of an "entity" to have confiscated the gold from the former Imperial Bank.

It is expected the hearings here will be secret. The evidence will be taken to New York and used in the trial there later.

Courts Recognize Soviet.

The outstanding feature of the Bank of France's efforts to obtain possession of $5,000,000 in Russian gold through an action in the Federal courts here aaginst the Chase National Bank and the Equitable Trust Company, which subsequently merged with the Chase National, was the opinion handed down by Federal Judge Goddard on March 24, 1929, granting a large measure of judicial recognition to the Soviet Government. In denying all motions of the Bank of France, with one minor modification, to strike out the defenses of the Chase National and the Equitable Trust, Judge Goddard paved the way for argument by the American banks that the Soviet gold arrived here in conformity with American and international laws.

Judge Goddard went to considerable lengths in his opinion to explain that the existence of the Soviet Government may be recognized by the courts of this country, where the interests of American nationals are affected, despite lack of political recognition by the Federal Government.

The $5,201,000 at issue was sent back to Germany soon after the Bank of France began its action, the bank having failed to post the more than $5,000,000 bond which would have been required to hold it in the country. About the time the Bank of France began planning its action, the Treasury Department refused to assay the gold and it remained in the vaults of the Chase National and Equitable Trust, losing $1,000 a day interest.

Mrs. Tunney Gratifies Sick Boy; Brings Ex-Fighter to Hospital

SAYRE, Pa., July 26 (AP).—Gene Tunney, former heavyweight champion, by visiting a hospital here brought happiness to one small boy.

During a tour of the Robert Packer Hospital, Mrs. Donald Guthrie, wife of the chief surgeon, who was accompanied by Mrs. Gene Tunney, stopped at the bedside of a boy suffering with a broken leg.

"This is Mrs. Tunney," Mrs. Guthrie said to the patient.

"I don't want to see Mrs. Tunney. I want to see the fighter. It's tough to be here with all the other kids seeing Gene," was the response.

Several hours later Mrs. Tunney returned with the former fighter and went to the same cot. A big smile spread over the face on the bed.

2 HELD IN JERSEY SLAYING.

Jailed in Few Hours, Charged With Killing New Brunswick Man.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., July 26.—Several hours after they had been arrested today two men were being held in the Somerset County jail at Somerville charged with first-degree murder in connection with the slaying of Jacob Swiller, 46 years old, of New Brunswick, who was shot to death on June 29. The two men are Angelo Lombardi, 19, of 22 New Street, and John Tracy, 28, of 101 Delevan Street.

They were questioned at length and early this afternoon were taken to the office of Somerset County Prosecutor Francis Bergen in Somerville, where they were examined again. After the questioning, it was announced that they had admitted they went to Swiller's bungalow gasoline station on the Lincoln Highway to rob him and shot him when he recognized them.

Each was said to have admitted having a pistol, but blamed the other for the shooting. The two are said to have admitted several robberies in Middlesex County.

AMTORG ACCUSED IN SMUGGLING PLOT

Kreitz, 42 years old, alias Freeman, alias Albert, of 5,305 Sixty-fifth Street, Woodside, Queens, and Abraham Schafran, 62 years old, of 2,111 Sixty-seventh Street, Brooklyn. The little black book and the baptismal certificates were found on Kreitz.

Kreitz was arrested after a meeting with Schafran in Times Square and taken to the Federal Building by special customs agents under the direction of Agent James J. Lynch. Schafran was taken at his place of business, 116 Nassau Street. They were arraigned before Commissioner Cotter, accused of facilitating the smuggling of the watch movements and held in $15,000 bail each for a hearing on Aug. 7. Being unable to produce bail, they were put in cells.

The Federal authorities, Mr. Tuttle revealed, are looking also for William Vulcan, who has an office, together with Schafran, at the Nassau Street address, and Volodia Assaturov, who was described by Kreitz and Schafran as an official of the Amtorg through whom the watch movements were brought into this country. According to Mr. Tuttle, Schafran described Assaturov as the controller of the Amtorg corporation.

Mr. Tuttle told Commissioner Cotter that according to information received by him from the police Assaturov was the head of the Russian Ogpu, Soviet secret police, in this country. Schafran informed the Federal authorities that Assaturov had told him he could smuggle 15,000 watch movements into this country at a price of $1.50 each as against the regular price of $3.75.

Assaturov's name cropped up several times before the Congressional committee investigating Communist activities during hearings here last week. Witnesses for the Amtorg appearing before the committee denied that there was a man by that name in the Amtorg's employ. Yesterday, however, it was admitted by M. Mendelson, publicity director for the Amtorg, that a man named Assaturov had been in the employ of the Amtorg until six weeks ago, when he returned to Russia. Mr. Mendelson could not recall the man's first name. It was emphatically denied at the Amtorg offices that the agency had anything to do with the smuggling.

Members of the Congregational Committee during its hearings here saw a connection between the departure of some Amtorg employes for Russia and the investigation. This was denied by Amtorg representatives.

In a telegram from Detroit last night, where the committee yesterday concluded its sessions preparatory to hearings in Chicago, Representative Hamilton Fish Jr., chairman of the committee, said he believed Assaturov left here hurriedly together with a man named Gordon, who has been mentioned as one of the chiefs of the Ogpu in America.

Says Man Was Only a Clerk.

Assaturov, Mr. Mendelson said, was only a clerk in the Amtorg office and expressed surprise that a man of his humble position could engage in smuggling operations requiring considerable sums of money. It was pointed out by Samuel Shipman, of the Amtorg's information bureau, that the Amtorg does not import watches or watch movements. Peter A. Bogdanov, chairman of the Amtorg, could not be reached, as he was engaged in a conference of Amtorg officials and attorneys at which means were discussed to lift the Treasury Department's embargo on Soviet pulpwood.

The 640 watch movements involved in the alleged smuggling operation were seized by Federal agents in three lots. One was in Kreitz's possession, another in Schafran's office in Nassau Street, a small place for the sale and repair of watches, and the third in Schafran's home. Schafran told the police that Vulcan had informed him about still larger stores of smuggled watch movements to be obtained, and advised him to go to Times Square and await the arrival of a man who would identify himself by means of a roughly torn section of a visiting card bearing Assaturov's name. Schafran received one half of the torn card and with the other piece Kreitz yesterday identified himself, receiving 250 watch movements from Schafran.

The watch movements, according to Lynch, are of six and fifteen jewels, dependable Swiss types.

Deny Manganese Competition.

In addition to making emphatic denial of the Amtorg's connection with the alleged smuggling of the watch movements, officials of the organization also denied the charge made by the American Manganese Producers' Association, through J. Carson Adkerson, the president, that the Soviet Government was dumping manganese ore into this country to the destruction of the American manganese industry. Denial was also made by Amtorg officials that Soviet pulpwood brought here was being produced by convict labor, a condition responsible for the Treasury Department's embargo on this commodity.

The Amtorg's denial of the manganese dumping was in an interview by A. V. Mikadze, representative of the Soviet Manganexport Corporation in the United States. A. E. Kalnin, president of Rudo-Export, the ore export corporation of the U. S. S. R., which handles all Soviet exports of ores, including manganese, iron ore, magnesite, asbestos, graphite, and so forth, was also present at the interview. Mr. Kalnin arrived in this country on July 14 and expects to spend several weeks here in connection with the business of the Rudo-Export.

"Soviet manganese is being purchased in the United States largely by the United States Steel Corporation and the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, who have been using Chiaturi manganese ever since 1886," said Mr. Mikadge. "The Soviet Union is not only the world's principal source of manganese at the present time, but is also producing manganese of unusually high quality. The pure manganese content of washed manganese ore imported into this country is no less than 52-53 per cent, while the content of iron ore and phosphorus is very small.

"According to Soviet statistics, exports of manganese to the United States during the twelve months ended Sept. 30, 1929, amounted to 338,336 metric tons. During the following nine months about 210,000 tons were imported into this country. Soviet manganese is sold in the United States at world market prices.

"Soviet manganese imported into this country comes from the Chiaturi mines (in the Soviet Georgian Republic), which are located not far from the Black Sea. The transportation facilities are excellent. The total Chiaturi manganese production during the fiscal year 1928-29 amounted to about 1,300,000 tons, while the amount of concentrated ore received was about half that figure.

"About 7,600 workers are employed in the Chiaturi mines at the present time. While the average wages amount to about 84 rubles per month ($43), some miners receive from 7 to 8 rubles per day ($3.50 to $4). In addition, all workers receive free medical service, living quarters free or at nominal rent, free sickness, old age and unemployment insurance. In addition, workers receive vacations of at least two weeks per year. The supplies for the workers are provided by cooperative stores, the prices of which are much lower than in private stores. Fruits, vegetables and fats are available in abundance. It may be truly said that the condition of workers in the Chiaturi mines is very satisfactory. There is absolutely no convict or forced labor in the manganese mines. Workers are hired through labor exchanges, their wages are regulated by means of collective agreements with the trade unions, and they are free to quit the job whenever they wish."

Call Soviet Product Superior.

Amtorg officials emphasized that there was absolutely no competition between Russian manganese and American manganese ore because of the distinct superiority of the Russian product over the American. They pointed out that, while the United States uses annually 800,000 tons of manganese in the production of steel, the American output of the ore is only 46,000 tons a year. This alone, Amtorg officials said, should disprove the contention of American producers that Soviet mines are competing with American mines. It is obvious, the Amtorg spokesmen pointed out, that the American supply cannot fill the demand. Any competition on the part of the Russian manganese industry, it was pointed out, is with India and Africa, not the United States.

Moreover, Amtorg officials said, Soviet manganese is being sold in this country on long-term contracts which could not be regarded as dumping. While the Soviet manganese trust is prepared to meet the prices of Indian and African producers it is not competing with American mines, since the inferior quality of manganese here offers no room for competition, it was pointed out. Amtorg officials also emphasized that the provisions in the recent American tariff bill with respect to manganese imports concerned ore of inferior quality such as is produced in the United States. No provisions against the importation of Russian manganese were contemplated in the tariff bill, the officials insisted.

They refused to comment on cables from Moscow quoting Maxim Litvinov, Soviet Foreign Minister, as threatening economic reprisals against the United States for the attacks on the Amtorg by the Congressional committee investigating communism, of which Representative Hamilton Fish Jr. is chairman, and from other sources.

POLICEMAN BEATEN BY A STREET CROWD

Pummeled by East Side Rioters as He Tries to Quell Fight of Rival Peddlers.

2 OTHERS GO TO HOSPITAL

Detectives Draw Pistols to Stop Row of Enemy Fruit Men's Families—Armed Fighter Escapes.

An angry crowd of forty or fifty persons swarmed out of tenements in the lower east side shortly after 6 o'clock last night and set upon Patrolman Joseph Columbo of the East Thirty-fifth Street Station when he tried to break up a riot precipitated by a fight between John Diconstanzo and George Balustrere, rival fruit dealers at 222 and 226 East Twenty-ninth Street.

While more than 600 excited neighbors stood by and watched the fight from the street, blocking traffic, the combatants pummeled the patrolman so badly that when the disturbance was quelled by the intervention of a second patrolman and two detectives, Columbo had to be treated at Bellevue Hospital.

Balustrere and Louis Lovallo, his brother-in-law, of 324 East Twenty-eighth Street, also were taken to Bellevue Hospital, where Dr. Dolin treated them for cuts and bruises. Eight stitches were taken in Balustrere's chest. The police arrested Diconstanzo and Peter Rossi, owner of the building, at 229 East Twenty-ninth Street, where the former lives and has his fruit stand.

They were taken later to the East Thirty-fifth Street station, Diconstanzo on complaint of Balustrere and Rossi on complaint of Lovallo. During the row, according to the police, Diconstanzo drew a pistol and passed it to his brother, Frank, who escaped arrest. The prisoners were charged with felonious assault.

Detectives said that the fight had its origin in a feud between the families of the fruit peddlers, who had been rivals for years. The atmosphere in the neighborhood was tense last night when Diconstanzo walked out of his store.

He got as far as the store of his rival two doors away when, as nearly as the police were able to learn, a female relative of Balustrere shouted something at Diconstanzo and he struck her. Lovallo then rushed out from his brother-in-law's store, and Rossi came from his tenant's store to join in the fight.

Fists and feet were flying when Patrolman Columbo arrived. He reported later that he saw the flash of knife steel. His attempt to break up the mêlée was a signal, he said, for the combatants, joined by onlookers, to stop their feud long enough to knock him to the sidewalk and kick and beat him.

Patrolman Fred Roge of the East Thirty-fifth Street station heard the commotion from his beat and came down from Thirtieth Street to investigate. Meanwhile the riot had been reported to the station by a citizen. When Roge arrived he found Detectives Carey and Roth, their revolvers drawn, in command of the situation.

The only participant with any fight left in him was Frank Diconstanzo. Roth grappled with him while Carey dispersed the others and Roge put in a call for an ambulance. Frank broke away and ran, followed by the detective, into an alley at 220 East Twenty-eighth Street. He escaped, but Roth found the pistol which John Diconstanzo had passed to him, according to Columbo, during the fight.

5 SEIZED IN ROBBERY AFTER 20-MILE CHASE

Three Men and Two Women Are Arrested in Newark on Druggist's Charges.

Jacob Landau was lured to a lonely spont in Perth Amboy, N. J., early yesterday morning and robbed of $30 by three men, he told the police. He pursued the robbers to Washington Street and Clinton Avenue, Newark, where their automobile overturned. Two of its occupants are in serious condition and all are under arrest, together with two young women.

They described themselves as William Blackburne of 249 Old Bergen Road, Jersey City; Raymond Duke of Hoboken, Mrs. Mary Riche of 415 Elmer Street, Trenton; George Becker of 48 Orchard Street, Newark, and Mary Haines of 3 Hawthorne Avenue, Newark.

According to the account given to the police Mr. Landau, who is a drug store proprietor, was hailed by the two women while he was driving along Astor Street, Newark. He drove to Perth Amboy, and at an isolated point near the Victory Bridge they demanded to be let out. As Landau stopped his car another automobile halted directly behind it.

The girls, he said, ran back to the other car and returned with three men, each of whom carried a pistol. "Where's the liquor?" he quoted one of the men as saying. Finding he had none, they demanded his money. One of the men, he said, then turned off the ignition in Landau's car and threw the key into a ditch. They and the women then departed.

Landau said he recovered the key and followed the other automobile twenty miles into Broad Street, Newark. He picked up Sergeant Kraszowski and Patrolman Newman, and the chase continued. The fugitives increased their speed and at Washington and Clinton Avenues their car overturned and crashed into a pole.

Miss Haines and Becker fled, but were arrested later. Blackburne and Duke were unconscious and suffering apparently from fractured skulls, it was said at Newark City Hospital.

RETURNS, HALTS HIS BURIAL

Atlantic City Man Finds Family Planning Funeral as His.

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., July 26.—Robert J. Greer, 65 years old, of 320 Grammercy Place, today came as near to seeing the preparations for his own funeral as he probably ever will.

Mr. Greer left home last week and was not heard from. Yesterday his three grandsons went to an Atlantic City morgue and there identified the body of a man who had died from the effects of the heat at Brigantine Beach, and who they said was their grandfather.

Today the Greer family were sitting in their home making preparations for the funeral when Mr. Greer walked in. He said there must be some mistake, and the family agreed with him. Robert Greer 3d, grandson, said the dead man had closely resembled his grandfather.

FISTS OF 2 BREAK UP RALLY OF 2,000 REDS

Brothers Give Black Eyes and Bloody Noses in Dispersing New Brunswick (N. J.) Crowd.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., July 26.—Two red-headed brothers and their fists made short shrift of a Communist rally which had attracted 2,000 persons at French and New Streets here tonight. They shouldered their way through the throng, lashing out with their fists, giving black eyes and bloody noses at random.

A few minutes before the auditors, who had been absorbing oratory condemning the enemies of communism in general and in particular the Congressional committee which has been holding hearings in New York, had been thrown into confusion by the arrival of five pieces of fire apparatus responding to a false alarm. The booing and hissing of firemen had quieted down when the brothers, said to be Thomas and Frank Ward, made their sally.

Two other Communist meetings were broken up here recently by members of John H. Neilson Post, Veterans of Foreign Wars, but on this occasion the veterans had announced that they would not interfere.

After the clamor which followed the arrival of the fire engines had died down a man who said he was a war veteran stepped up on the camp chair which was being used as a speakers' stand and started to harangue the crowd. He was greeted by a shower of eggs which spattered across the front of a grocery store behind him. Shortly after that the man, said to be Thomas Ward, who was more than six feet tall, pulled off his upper garments and pushed his way toward the chair. Witnesses said that a moment later they saw the speaker retreating to safety with his nose bleeding.

The brothers' attack was successful and the crowd dispersed soon after the agitators had fled in all directions. Traffic along French Street, which is the Lincoln Highway through New Brunswick, was tied up for some time. Two policemen who had been directing traffic near by took no part in the fray.

A MACEDONIAN DENIAL

That Dr. Angelescu's Assailant Is Not Connected With Their Movement.

The central committee of the Macedonian Political Organization in the United States, through its vice president, L. L. Kisselintcheff, has issued a statement, with regard to the attempted assassination of Dr. Constantine Angelescu, acting Rumanian Minister of the Interior, on July 21, to the effect that Georg Beza, the would-be assassin, is unknown to the Macedonian movement; that the Macedonian movement "or the Macedonians as a nation have nothing to do with Rumania or with her internal affairs; that this movement, as carried on by the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization in Macedonia, and its societies in Europe and America, aims only at the liberation of Macedonia from Yugoslavia, Greece and Bulgaria; that it is not an anti-Semitic movement and cannot be in favor of acts and activities like those of the Rumanian anti-Semitic movement, and that "the fate of the Macedonians does not differ from the fate of the Jews who are enjoying our full sympathy in their struggle for fair and just treatment throughout the world."

DAVID W. GUION GIVES TEXAS TUNES AT ROXY

Native Composer's Settings of Ranch Songs Receive Colorful Ensemble Aid.

David W. Guion, composer of Texas, was heard last evening in a number of his compositions at the Roxy Theatre. In the section of the program headed "Prairie Echoes," Mr. Guion was assisted by the Roxy Symphony Orchestra, the Roxyettes, and various entertainers.

This genuinely American composer proved one thing last night conclusively, that there is a wealth of racy and native music in this country aside from jazz and its adapted and transformed branches. Others have happily explored related fields of spirituals and hill songs; Mr. Guion has put on paper those songs and tunes which came into being on the ranch. One of these, "The Bold Vaquero," was sung by an old cowpuncher to the composer's mother who sang it to him.

Other items included "Home on the Range," with Harold Van Duzee, tenor, as soloist; "The Harmonica Player," with the comedy dancing skit as a stage background; "The Cowboy's Meditation," with John Gurney, baritone, as soloist, and the "Texas Fox Trot," with an unusually clever dancing imitation of horseback riding by the Roxyettes. The composer, though he has studied the piano under Godowsky in Vienna, is self-taught in musical theory, and this may explain in a measure that the songs were harmonized as they should be without losing their individuality and native flavor.

In the opening item, "Turkey in the Straw," the composer was called upon to direct the orchestra from the piano stool. It seemed to divide his powers and attention. The production and music were among the most interesting of the Summer season.

Paul Whiteman will play Mr. Guion's "Primitive Ballet" in November with his orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

NINTH MAN INDICTED FOR CUTTEN ROBBERY

Rosenberg Is Held as Last Member of Chicago Gang Which Stole Jewels Eight Years Ago.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, July 26.—The unrelenting efforts of Arthur W. Cutten, Chicago stock and wheat speculator, to round up the bandit gang who robbed his home of $20,000 in jewelry eight years ago, have been crowned with success.

The ninth and last alleged member of the gang was under a $13,000 bond today awaiting trial on Sept. 8 on charges of conspiracy to rob and robbery.

The man is Caspar Rosenberg, whose brother Simon, was seized in April and was sentenced to Joliet penitentiary after pleading guilty.

After the robbery the bandits locked Mr. Cutten in a vault to forestall immediate pursuit. He thought this action cruel and he vowed to send every one of the gang to jail.

His agents went to work and one by one the bandits were caught and sent to jail. Caspar Rosenberg, the last of all, walked into the office of State's Attorney C. W. Read at Wheaton in Du Page County yesterday and said:

"I'm Caspar Rosenberg. I have been hunted long enough. I'm innocent and I am prepared to prove it."

Thirty minutes later he was arraigned before Circuit Judge F. W. Shepherd. He pleaded not guilty and his bond was provided by Harry J. Bauer of Chicago.

Scholar and Philanthropist.

Dr. Silverman was one of the most prominent clergymen of his faith in America. He was known not only as the rabbi of the most influential temple in the metropolis but as a scholar, writer, philanthropist and orator. He was an active member of the Clergy Club, which is made up largely of Protestant ministers. By special invitation Dr. Silverman attended the funeral of Cardinal Farley in St. Patrick's Cathedral. He was the only rabbi officially present.

Of late years Dr. Silverman had spent much time in travel, taking several trips to Palestine to help his fellow Jews there. The last few Summers he had spent in Europe. He was always accompanied by Mrs. Silverman.

Dr. Silverman was the youngest man ever elected as rabbi of an important temple in the United States. He came to this city at 29 as assistant rabbi at Temple Emanu-El, at 43 he was the rabbi.

In all these years the temple was at Fifth Avenue and Forty-third Street. When a few years ago the property was sold and the landmark which he loved was demolished, it caused him personal grief. But he realized that the house of worship would have had to be entirely rebuilt if it was to be continued on that site. He realized, too, that the location uptown would make it easier for his members to attend regularly.

In the former temple Dr. Silverman had confirmed, married and buried a generation. He knew all of the children by their first names and he never forgot one of his own flock.

Fortieth Anniversary Recalled.

Distinguished rabbis of both the Orthodox and Reform faith, Christian ministers, fellow-lodge members and a large company of the best-known Jewish laity of the city gathered in Temple Emanu-El the evening of March 4, 1928, at a service and reception in celebration of the fortieth anniversary in the ministry of Dr. Silverman.

A feature of the program was the presentation to Dr. Silverman of a life-size oil painting of himself, which had just been completed. The Rev. Dr. Samuel Schulman, who was long rabbi of Temple Beth-El, which had recently been merged with Temple Emanu-El, offered the invocation and made a brief address of welcome.

Greetings from the Central Conference of American Rabbis, of which Dr. Silverman was president for three years, were brought by the Rev. Dr. Hyman G. Enelow, the president, who for many years had been associated with Dr. Silverman at Emanu-El. Greetings from the Association of Reform Rabbis, of which Dr. Silverman was honorary president, were brought by the Rev. Dr. Nathan Stern, the president. A tribute from the New York Board of Jewish Ministers, of which Dr. Silverman also was honorary president, was brought by the Rev. Dr. Barnett A. Elzas, the president. A tribute from the Hebrew Union College, Cincinnati, Ohio, was brought by Henry W. Toch, treasurer of the trustees of Temple Emanu-El.

Born in Cincinnati.

Dr. Silverman was born on Aug. 25, 1860, in Cincinnati, the son of Michael Henry and Ulrika Silverman and was educated in the public schools of his native city. He obtained his classical education in the University of Cincinnati and his theological education in the Hebrew Union College.

He was ordained in 1884 and took his D. D. degree at Hebrew Union College three years later. In 1925, he obtained the degree of D. H. L. at New York University.

Rabbi Silverman plunged into his religious work with zeal unusual even for a man so young. When he assumed spiritual direction of Temple Emanu-El in Dallas in 1884, he found that the members of his faith were comparatively few in the State and he saw that they were widely scattered. To keep in touch with them he established a circuit and brought them closer together.

By the time he had completed one year as rabbi in Dallas and three years in Temple Israel in Galveston his work began to bear fruit, and when he was called to New York in 1888, to become junior rabbi in Temple Emanu-El, he left behind him the foundation for several new Texas synagogues.

In New York he found a greater scope for his tireless spirit. The city at that time had a Jewish population of about 250,000 centred chiefly on the east side. As it grew he was one of the leading organizers of community centres, charitable units and social welfare bodies that were needed to keep pace with the steady influx of immigrants.

Raised to Position of Head Rabbi.

When Dr. Gustav Gottheil died in 1903, Rabbi Silverman was raised from assistant to head rabbi of Temple Emanu-El, becoming the fourth spiritual leader of the congregation, which even at that time was recognized as the most influential in the United States. He remained as its active head until 1922, when he resigned to be able to give more time to his literary and communal work.

REV. DR. JOSEPH SILVERMAN.

In recognition of Dr. Silverman's thirty-four years with the temple the board of trustees, headed by the late Louis Marshall, made him rabbi emeritus for life at an annual salary of $12,000. He continued to be one of the most active supporters of the congregation and in addition worked with great zeal in the Zionist movement for establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine.

Dr. Silverman was a commanding and impressive figure in the pulpit. He possessed a rich, resonant voice and was noted for unusual eloquence. Because of his height and his snowy beard he was often referred to in the newspapers as resembling "an Isaiah in modern dress."

The temple was always crowded when he spoke. People not of his faith came to hear him raise his voice against feminism and woman suffrage, which he held to be "subversive to the interests of the child," and to his arguments against socialism, anarchism and bolshevism, all of which he said were based on false theories and constituted a menace to American institutions.

Known for His Courage.

He was known for his courage. He attacked corruption in politics, in the social structure and in its incipience in religion. At the same time he continued to build up the temple, raising it to high influence and power. He formed social and educational units about it and gave his aid to all progressive movements.

Among his literary works were volumes on Reformed Judaism, textbooks for religious schools, monographs on various theological subjects and articles for the newspapers and for encyclopedias. He was consulting editor for the Jewish Encyclopedia.

Dr. Silverman was founder and first president of the Emanu-El Brotherhood, former Grand Chaplain of the Masonic fraternity in New York State; former president of the Eastern Council of Reformed Rabbis and of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. He was in addition, affiliated with the Palestine Foundation Fund, American Jewish Committee, Palestine Research Society, Federation of Jewish Philanthropic Societies of New York City, Palestine Exploration Society, United Jewish Campaign, Ohio Society, Independent Order B'nai B'rith, New York Board of Jewish Ministers and Temple Emanu-El, Brooklyn.

LEADERS LAUD SILVERMAN.

His Courage and Universal Charity Recalled by Associates.

Rabbi Stephen S. Wise of the Free Synagogue, who will deliver the address at the funeral service Tuesday morning, paid the following tribute to Dr. Silverman last night at Lake Placid, N. Y.:

> Dr. Silverman has the distinction of being one of the earliest disciples of Isaac M. Wise, founder of the Hebrew Union College, and succeeded the latter as president of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. He was a sturdy and uncompromising reformer who had the courage and the vision a decade ago to ally himself with the cause of Zionism, thus illustrating the possibility of bringing Zionism into accord with liberal Judaism. For nearly forty years he served the pulpit of Emanu-El and some of his utterances will long be remembered. I chance to recall his outstanding work at the Golden Jubilee of Emanu-El some thirty-five years ago, when he electrified the great congregation with a powerful utterance. He was a faithful, earnest and beloved teacher of Israel.

Mgr. Michael J. Lavelle, rector of St. Patrick's Cathedral, who had known Rabbi Silverman for forty-one years, said of him: Rabbi Silverman was a man of universal charity who was interested in everything that was good. He was warmly appreciated by all with whom he came into contact.

OBSTACLE TO CIVIC CENTRE.

Action by Estimate Board Found Needed to Close City Hall Place.

Action by the Board of Estimate will be necessary to close up the 300-foot street running in back of the Municipal Building from Duane Street to Pearl Street, known as City Hall Place, Assistant Corporation Counsel Joel J. Squier, in charge of the Bureau of Street Openings, said last night. The closing of this street will be necessary in order that the land through which it runs may be used by the city as part of its new civic centre.

Mr. Squier said that he did not anticipate any difficulty in taking the necessary legal steps toward closing the street. The property involved, he said, was not of any great value, and he thought the Board of Estimate wished to lose no time in removing all obstacles in the way of the Manhattan civic centre.

MOTOR THEFT PLOT SEEN IN 3 ARRESTS

Police Say Cars Stolen in Philadelphia Were Disposed Of to Dealers in Queens.

CAUGHT MAKING A SALE

Two Men From Quaker City and a Hillside Avenue Garage Owner Are Held in Jamaica.

A system by which automobiles stolen in Philadelphia were being palmed off upon unsuspecting dealers in Queens is believed to have been broken up by the police, it was revealed yesterday, when three men were arraigned before Magistrate Thomas Downs in Jamaica on charges of complicity in the scheme.

Two of the prisoners were from Philadelphia. They are charged specifically with bringing stolen property into the State. The third, a garage owner of Queens, is alleged to have furnished them the names and addresses of second-hand dealers where the cars might be sold with a minimum of risk of detection.

Laymon Stevens, 24 years old, of 1,723 Vine Street and Benjamin Taylor, 33, of 5,826 North Park Avenue, both of Philadelphia, were held without bail by Magistrate Downs after he received information that both men had been arrested before for stealing automobiles. Michael Drexel, 25, owner of a garage at Hillside Avenue and 218th Street, Queens, was released in $1,000 bail after he also had entered a plea of not guilty. The magistrate set July 30 for further hearing.

According to Detective James Mangan, who arrested Stevens and Taylor on Friday night when they were trying to sell an automobile to a dealer, the two brought several stolen cars from Philadelphia, obtained New York license plates and sold them in New York within the last month.

Police first got on the trail several days ago, when a Jamaica dealer in used cars reported that two men who had accepted $200 as a down payment on a car they had offered him had failed to return to collect the balance due them. Detectives checked the engine number on the automobile the dealer had bought and found it had been stolen.

Detective Mangan began an investigation which led to his being present on Friday night when Stevens and Taylor were trying to sell an automobile to another dealer. Stevens was arrested on the spot but Taylor tried to escape in the automobile in which he was sitting, only to be overtaken after a short chase. Drexel was arrested several hours later in Bayside.

VOTES FOR $700,000 SEWER.

Elmsford Approves Disputed Issue of Trustees in Referendum.

Special to The New York Times.

ELMSFORD, N. Y., July 26.—This community, with 600 taxpayers eligible to vote, today cast 187 ballots for and 97 ballots against a village board resolution of June 2 for a $700,000 sewer system.

The vote was a referendum on the resolution, which had aroused the opposition of David Tepp, former village trustee. He was of the opinion that the resolution called for a $700,000 bond issue, and as leader of a dissatisfied faction obtained the signatures of 184 taxpayers demanding the referendum.

The financing of the sewer system will be by issuance of certificates of indebtedness as needed. This is in accordance with State law.

WOULD HAVE AUTOS CARRY SPARE LIGHTS

Jersey Commissioner Proposes Extra-Bulb Requirement to End "One-Eye" Problem.

FINDS LAW EVASION EASY

Says Motorists Take Advantage of Leniency—Wants Police to Watch Roadside Repairs.

TRENTON, N. J., July 26.—Adoption of provisions giving officials the right to prescribe spare headlight bulbs as part of an automobile's equipment is being considered by Motor Vehicle Commissioner Harold G. Hoffman. The commissioner declared in a statement today that motor vehicle authorities, after years of grappling with the problem of the "one-eyed" car, see this as a way out of a dangerous situation.

"The problem," he declared, "is much more serious than the average motorist realizes. From an enforcement standpoint, it is especially difficult. That is not due to an inadequacy in the traffic law, for it is especially set forth therein that cars must have two lights showing in front. Any motorist who does not comply is subject to arrest.

"Of all violations of the regulations, however, this one is among the most difficult for which to penalize a car owner. While many motorists employ it unfairly, the excuse that they did not know one light was out always sounds plausible. Police officers are human and they do not like to impose a penalty when the excuse may have even seeming legitimacy.

"However, this disposition has undoubtedly contributed to the prolongation of the problem of the one-eyed car. In most cities and States the attitude of enforcement authorities has been merely to warn the driver and recommend immediate action on his part. Many car owners have consistently taken advantage of this leniency, so that many believe the restrictions must be tightened before the problem can be solved.

"Authorities are considering, as a result, the advisability of invoking the equipment provisions of the regulations to require motorists to carry spare headlight bulbs. Then when the police officer stops a car having only one headlight, the remedial steps can be taken before the owner is allowed to drive further."

BREAK JERSEY 'BOTTLE NECK.'

Officials to Divert Traffic Today at Congested Perth Amboy Bridge.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J., July 26.—Following a meeting here yesterday between Motor Vehicle Commissioner Harold G. Hoffman, the State Traffic Commission and police officials of Perth Amboy, new traffic regulations were ordered into effect today to reduce the week-end congestion at the "bottle neck" north of the Victory Bridge over Raritan River. The conference resulted from hundreds of complaints made by motorists of conditions on Saturdays and Sundays here.

Route 4, the only road by which motorists can reach North Jersey shore resorts, crosses a bridge over a railroad north of the Victory Bridge. The railroad span is wide enough for only two traffic lanes, and the result frequently is a line of cars several miles long when all the North Jersey and New York motorists start returning home Sunday nights.

Under the new plan, shore-bound traffic will cross the railroad bridge in double line, the road becoming a one-way thoroughfare. Northbound traffic will be diverted after leaving the Victory Bridge and proceed through Smith Street, New Brunswick Avenue and Amboy Avenue to the Lincoln Highway. The change is effective today.

Byrd Aide Denies He Ever Was Married to Brooklyn Woman.

Hearing on the action pressed against Sergeant Benjamin Roth, member of the Byrd Antarctic expedition, by Mrs. Stephen Lucas of 3,201 Avenue I, Brooklyn, charging he deserted her fifteen years ago, was adjourned yesterday by Judge Steers in Brooklyn Family Court, until Sept. 18. Mrs. Lucas, now remarried, asked support for her two children. Roth denied ever having married her.

Mrs. Lucas alleged that Roth and she were married eighteen years ago in Nejyvard, Hungary. Records which he had furnished the Byrd expedition headquarters, said he was born in New York City. Roth recently was cited by Secretary of War Hurley "for heroism while serving as a member of the Byrd Antarctic expedition."

SHIP YIELDS 12 STOWAWAYS

Chinese on Vessel From Havana Say They Paid to Be Smuggled In.

Customs officers yesterday discovered twelve Chinese stowaways who were attempting to gain entry to this country aboard the steamship Fairfield of the New York, America & Cuba Steamship Company, after the ship had docked at Pier 53, North River, from Havana.

Some of the Chinese told Inspector Chris Schmidt of the Customs Enforcement Bureau that they had paid $1,500 each at Havana to be landed in New York. It was not clear as to whom they had paid the money. Officers and members of the crew denied knowledge of the stowaways.

The twelve were held at Ellis Island for deportation to Cuba.

LEASE PAYS $50 FINE.

Film Actor Pleads Guilty to Striking Vivian Duncan.

LOS ANGELES, July 26 (AP).—Rex Lease, film actor, paid a $50 fine in court at Malibu Beach, fashionable motion picture resort, for punching the eye of Vivian Duncan of the Duncan Sisters dancing team.

The actor suddenly abandoned his plan to fight the battery charge preferred by the dancer and pleaded guilty.

In demanding a jury trial after charges had been placed against him, Lease said the blow to the Duncan eye was merely a counter one struck in self defense.

Her version of the affair was that Lease struck her in the early morning hours of July 6, when he refused to give her the keys to her car and she reproved his advances.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMDEN, N. J., July 26.—Seven men and two women were held without bail in the Camden County jail tonight to await the outcome of injuries received by two other men in a fight early today in the Homestead Inn at Gloucester.

Lawrence T. Doran, chief of county detectives, following an investigation, declared that guns, knives and a table leg had been used promiscuously. Neither the prisoners nor the injured men would discuss the altercation.

Joseph Konowal, 22 years old, of Conshohocken, Pa., and Boris P. Ehly, 23, of 402 Mitchell Street, Philadelphia, were taken to Hahnemann Hospital in Philadelphia, where physicians said they had serious cranial injuries. Others arrested and held without bail by Magistrate Laird were Joseph Greenan, bartender; Anna Snyder, Rose White, Thomas McGarrity and Frederick Schemeld, who gave the inn as their home address; John Greenan, proprietor, and Ernest Thibeau of Malden, Mass., a salesman.

BAIL DENIED IN SILK THEFT.

Merchant in Court for Burglary Is Said to Be an Ex-Convict.

Accused of the theft of $1,200 worth of silk from the loft of the High-Class Dress Company at 48 West Twelfth Street early Friday morning, Herman Rothenberg, 35 years old, of 1,382 Crotona Avenue, the Bronx, was held without bail for a hearing Tuesday by Magistrate Silbermann in Jefferson Market Court yesterday on a charge of burglary.

He was arrested by Detectives John Carlson and Joseph Braunswood of headquarters, who saw him enter the building where the burglary took place and recognized him as a man arrested for a similar theft six years ago. The detectives followed him to the office of the Henrietta Dress Company on the fifth floor, where they found twenty-employes engaged in cutting up the silk stolen from the concern four floors above. Rothenberg said he was the president of the Henrietta concern.

SCORES POOL RACKETEERS.

Court Holds Man, Seized in Lottery Fraud, in $5,000 Bail.

Magistrate Simpson in the Tombs Court yesterday denounced "racketeering" in lottery pools in this city when he held Alfred E. Keough, 52 years old, of 220-28 101st Street, Queens Village, Queens, in $5,000 bail for trial in Special Sessions.

Assistant District Attorney Eugene McAuliffe had suggested that the bail be fixed at $1,000, twice the amount usually demanded, but the magistrate declared that $5,000 was not too much because of the epidemic of fraudulent gambling pools.

Keough, who said he was a Canadian, was arrested the night before in the composing room of an afternoon newspaper by Detectives Coakley and Herrlitz of the Downtown Inspection District. They said they saw him pass a lottery ticket to one of the employes and arrested him.

ARREST ENDS VACATION.

Messenger Accused of Stealing $437 From Employer Here.

Benjamin Fisher, 18 years old, returned to his home at 251 Division Avenue, Brooklyn, last Friday night from a vacation trip to Jacksonville, Fla., to be arrested for the alleged theft of $437 from his former employer, Mrs. Leona Sperling, owner of a coffee store at 142 Forsythe Street.

When he was arraigned yesterday before Magistrate Simpson in the Tombs Court, he pleaded not guilty to charges of forgery and grand larceny, and was held in $1,000 bail pending a hearing tomorrow.

It was alleged that, between July 5 and 14 the youth, who was employed as an errand boy, pocketed $437 which he had been sent to deposit in a bank and covered his dishonesty by making entries in the deposit book with a rubber stamp.

FINDS $2,360 CHECK, GETS $1

Messenger Returns Certified Draft Picked Up on 46th Street.

A dollar was his reward for returning a $2,360.73 certified check he found in the street to the Raw Products Company of 247 Park Avenue, Edward J. Ford, a messenger employed at the Barclay Hotel, said yesterday afternoon.

He said he found the check on the sidewalk of Forty-sixth Street, between Park and Madison Avenues, at 10:30 o'clock Friday morning and returned it that noon, his earliest period of leisure. The check was drawn by the company on the Bank of America, he said, and payable to the National City Bank.

Even an amateur will recognize the authentic quality of this furniture. It's fine throughout, made by men who have a feeling for line and for the texture of wood. CLOSE FIGHT LOOMS AT CANADA'S POLLS

Conservatives Believed to Have Advantage Over Liberals in Tomorrow's Election.

CLEAR MAJORITY DOUBTED

Progressives Are an Unknown Factor as the Provinces Show Trend Against Party in Power.

OUR TARIFF AMONG ISSUES

Its Effects Upon Dominion Are Linked With Trade Depression in Bennett's Battle With King.

By J. A. McNEIL.

Special to The New York Times.

MONTREAL, July 25.—Canada enters the closing hours of its eight-week, Dominion-wide election campaign with the leaders and organizers of the two major parties making the usual confident and directly contradictory claims of anticipated victory, but the fight is anybody's until the last ballot is counted on Monday night.

Weighing the conflicting claims, and attempting an impartial appraisal of the situation, well-informed and cautious students of politics believe that the probabilities point to the qualified success of the Conservative party, to the extent that they will have more candidates elected than will the Liberals, but not sufficient for a clear majority over a possible combination of Liberals with the twenty to thirty members likely to be returned as Progressives, Independents Laborites and others.

Although since early June the professional politicians and their myrmidons have been striving strenuously to arouse the interest of the electorate at large, the rank and file of the rival parties refused to display any great enthusiasm until the final week approached, and even now, with polling only two days away, the excitement of previous general elections is markedly lacking

Reasons for Campaign Apathy.

The main reason for the unusual apathy that has characterized the contest are two in number.

The first is found in the improved methods of communication, especially the generous use of the radio, and the highly developed news-gathering service of the Canadian press, which, in combination, have familiarized the voters with the policies and views of the leaders, their chief lieutenants and the principal candidates to a degree and over a period impossible in any preceding election, with the consequence that complaints have been voiced that a two-months' campaign is unnecessarily long, and that six weeks would be quite enough.

The second reason is that the chief issue at stake is a purely economic one, centring upon the tariff and its possible effects on the prevailing financial, commercial, industrial and agricultural depression and its accompaniment of unemployment.

The counter-arguments of the party chiefs and their respective candidates have failed to elicit anything like the response that was apparent in a campaign into which elements of sentiment and prejudice were injected, like the patriotic and imperial considerations which were a factor in the election of 1911, when reciprocity was so decisively defeated, or the wartime fervor which infused the coalition government's conscription campaign of 1917.

Hint of a New Undercurrent.

Political mass meetings and demonstrations are notoriously unreadable as gauges of the real trend of public opinion in general election. Both W. L. Mackenzie King, the Liberal Prime Minister and R. B. Bennett, the Conservative chieftain, have everywhere been greeted by cheering crowds.

But shrewd journalistic and other observers have noted in the present campaign an undercurrent of hostility to the Liberal leader unknown in his three previous appeals to the country, while in portions of Quebec and the Western Provinces, where the Conservative party has been almost submerged for years, Mr. Bennett and his candidates have been received with a cordiality that has surprised them and caused misgivings to their opponents.

This is one of several aspects of the situation which lead hard-headed and impartial onlookers to believe that Mr. Bennett, in ring parlance, has the present holder of the political championship "shaded."

If Mr. King and his colleagues go down, it will be largely because they are victims of world-wide economic conditions which they could not foresee, and still less prevent. They are experiencing the unpopularity that attaches to any government when hard times come.

The stock market crash and its aftermath in the United States had a definite repercussion in Canada, and hard upon this came the cessation of European wheat buying which left the Canadian crop of 1929 in the elevators, where much of it still remains, resulting in frozen assets and impaired buying power for the farmer, sharply reduced railway and steamship earnings and labor outlay, curtailment of factory production to meet lessened consumption, and all the attendant evils of such a rude wrench to the nation's activities.

Through the Winter there was a growing pessimism, combined with vague irritation against the men in office at the national capital, and these feelings were not alleviated by the spectacle of the United States Congress devising tariff measures designed further to restrict Canada's

Bar Chewing Gum and Matches As Aids in Nebraska Campaign

LINCOLN, Neb., July 26 (AP).—Chewing gum and matches in the form of political advertising are taboo in Nebraska.

This was announced today by Attorney General C. A. Sorenson in response to a query from a candidate for State office, who said he had been threatened with criminal prosecution by his opponent if he persisted in distributing $1,000 worth of paper matches bearing his campaign data.

Though neither matches nor gum have any great intrinsic value, Mr. Sorenson decided, the corrupt practices law bars the giving of any article, regardless of its value.

VOORHIS 101 TODAY; FETE WILL BE QUIET

Centenarian Visits Office Unexpectedly and Is Greeted by City Officials.

ENERGETIC DESPITE HEAT

To Spend Anniversary Where It Is Easiest to Keep Cool—Grateful for Good-Will Shown to Him.

On the eve of his 101st birthday, John R. Voorhis unexpectedly visited his office in the Municipal Building yesterday. The president of the New York City Board of Elections was congratulated during the morning by officials of his own and other city departments.

An energetic, erect, if somewhat lined and grayed figure stood by the desk and greeted visitors who had come to find out how he intended to spend his birthday.

"I am most pleased to see you here and grateful for the good wishes you bring me on my birthday," Mr. Voorhis said. "I am indeed thankful, among many other things, for the sincere good-will shown me by the press of the city. I am feeling fine, although for the past few days I have been somewhat worn out by the extreme hot weather."

Mr. Voorhis has never liked formal celebration of his birthdays. Last year he had to consent because the Tammany Sachems, of whom he is Grand Sachem, and others insisted on marching to the Municipal Building to greet him. It took three days to celebrate Mr. Voorhis's 100th birthday.

A week ago he declared that the time had come "to put an end to the John R. Voorhis birthday parties." He said they had become "too monotonous," and he thought that today was an excellent time to terminate the celebration, because it was Sunday and a day of rest. The centennarian was evasive when asked where and how he was going to spend his anniversary today.

"I shall spend it where I think it will be easiest to keep cool," Mr. Voorhis said. "I don't know whether that will be at my Greenwich Street home or at my Summer place in Pompton Plains, N. J. At any rate, the observance will be a quiet one, with only members of the family present. I doubt if there will be any cake, just plain, wholesome food."

Mr. Voorhis revealed that he was celebrating two anniversaries this year. In addition to his birthday, he is observing a century of residence in New York City. He was born and spent the first year of his life in Pompton Plains.

Although Mr. Voorhis would not permit the employes of his office to observe his birthday formally, he instructed his deputy chief clerk, George W. Conklin, to place the following notice on the department's bulletin boards:

"Commissioner Voorhis while at his office today stated that he wished it made known to all officials and employes of the board that he gratefully appreciated the services they had rendered and for their cooperation and help in assisting in the administration of the affairs of the board, and especially during this trying weather of the past days, and extended his best wishes to each and every member of the staff, and expressed the hope that they and the members of their families may enjoy long, healthy and prosperous lives."

Alumni Increase Contributions in Annual "Giving Fund."

PHILADELPHIA, July 26.—Contributions totaling $60,148 have been received from 3,102 alumni of the University of Pennsylvania as a result of this year's Alumni Giving Fund effort at the university, it was announced today by Frederic L. Ballard, chairman of the committee. Last year the total was $54,236.

The movement was inaugurated four years ago and is intended to provide an unrestricted fund which may be used at the discretion of the university's trustees to meet the most pressing financial needs of the institution.

Every class graduated from 1872 to 1930 was represented among the contributors. The class of '87, with contributions totaling $6,540, headed the list. Among the professional schools, the medical alumni, as a group, led with $7,458.

Included on the committee this year were the following from alumni centres outside of Philadelphia: Robert C. Hill of New York City, James C. Irwin of Boston, Jansen Haines of Des Moines, Sir Henry W. Thornton of Canada, Charles A. Upson of Lockport, N. Y.; Cornelius D. Scully of Pittsburgh, Albert R. Brunker of Chicago, John B. Shober of New Orleans, George F. Snyder of Washington and Dr. Alexander H. Peacock of Seattle.

Two Nashville Girls Killed in Auto.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., July 26 (AP).—Miss Martha Curtis, daughter of the late A. D. Curtis, former State Purchasing Agent, and her cousin, Miss Lucille Curtis, were killed last night in an automobile accident. Charles Vaughn and R. L. Stockard Jr., their escorts, were injured. The automobile in which the four, all residents of Nashville, were riding hurtled fifty feet off the Church Street viaduct.

DAILY SCHOOL COST NEARING $1,000,000

Present Figure Is $930,000, Against $900,000 in 1929 for Each of 190 Days.

INSTRUCTION IS CHIEF ITEM

At Present $616,000, It Is Rising, While Relative Expenses for Other Needs Are Being Cut.

The daily cost to the city of educating the more than 1,200,000 pupils registered in the various divisions of the public educational system is now more than $930,000. Figures computed yesterday on the basis of the annual statistical report of the Board of Education show that, at the present rate of increase in annual budgets, the cost of the school system for each of the 190 days of the academic year will rise to $1,000,000 in a few years.

The school system's total expenditures during the calendar year 1929 reached a record figure of more than $171,000,000, the average outlay per school day being a little more than $900,000. Excepting a possible increase in the capital outlays during 1930, it is estimated that the educational expense will rise by more than $6,000,000 this year.

Cost of Instruction Proper.

The cost of instruction proper was $594,991 for each school day during the calendar year 1929, and this year it is estimated to reach more than $616,000. The daily expenditures of the system include, in addition to salaries of supervising and teaching forces, the average daily cost of supplies, physical maintenance of the school plant, its operation, the administration, business and general outlays, repairs and the per diem average disbursements for the construction of new buildings to provide additional sittings made necessary by increased registration.

While the greater part of the money provided by the city to meet education costs is supplied from direct taxation to the "general" and "special" school funds, that portion of it which makes possible the acquisition of sites for new schools and their construction comes from bonds and corporate stock.

In general, the cost of instruction proper has gone up, both absolutely and in relation to other school outlays. Of the total school budgets, the following percentages have been spent daily for "instruction proper" since 1925: (These figures are based on total budget expenditures, minus outlays for buildings and sites.)

	Per Cent
1926	85.240
1927	85.906
1928	85.995
1929	85.965

Supplies Cost Relatively Less.

It is significant, however, that the share of the cost of instruction proper spent for general supplies, free textbooks, library books and other non-salary outlays, has been reduced nearly steadily since 1926. In that year these items called for an appropriation of 3.4 per cent of the total budget, while last year they represented only 2.9 per cent, after having reached in 1928 the low figure of 2.84 per cent.

In other words, the salaries paid to teachers and supervisors are more and more nearly coming to represent, by themselves, the cost of instruction proper, and as the system grows the increased expenditures will be absorbed by the cost of salaries, while the cost of supplies will go down in proportion to the rest of the school budget.

The proportionate cost of maintenance and repair of the school plants is also being reduced in percentage figures, despite the enormous recent increase in the number of school buildings. The new structures, of course, need practically no repairs, but there are still hundreds of old buildings whose maintenance costs the city much money. In 1929 nearly 4 per cent of the total budget was absorbed by this item.

While the cost of repairs, in relation to the total budget, is being reduced, the cost of operation (custodian services, coal, water, &c.) has been going up in recent years, until last year it reached 5.44 per cent of the total school outlays.

TOWN HALL PLANS COURSE.

Program of "Continued Education" Announced for Next Year.

A program of "continued education," consisting of day and night courses, forums and seminars in the social and natural sciences and general cultural studies, will be launched by the Town Hall next year when the five-story addition to its building at 123 West Forty-third Street is completed, it was announced yesterday. The addition will contain the lecture rooms, private conference rooms and "intimate auditoriums" to be used by the "continued education" department, whose organization will be begun soon.

The new program, termed "an ambitious product of the educational work that is being carried on by the League for Political Education since 1894," was described by Miss Mary B. Cleveland, associate director of the league, as a "sort of intellectual laboratory for the practical application of academic learning, for the illustration of observed facts and for the interpretation of events taking place in all fields of human knowledge and activity."

Instruction will be given in philosophy, psychology, the sciences,

Watertown Paper Mill Owner's Widow Weds Her Former Chauffeur in Secret Ceremony

WATERTOWN, N. Y., July 26 (AP).—Mrs. Pauline Sears Empsall, young widow of Frank A. Empsall, owner of a paper mill and a department store, became the bride today of Howard M. Hall, who had been in the Empsall employ three years as chauffeur. The marriage ceremony was performed in Christ Episcopal Church of Clayton by the Rev. Ian MacDonald, the rector.

The bride gave her age as 33 and said she was born at Dalton, Mass. Mr. Hall's age was given as 32 and his occupation was listed as farming. Mrs. Hall is the daughter of Walter H. and Lydia Sears.

The marriage announcement was received by friends of the couple with surprise. This morning they slipped away from here and drove to Clayton. The marriage license was obtained by special arrangement last night at 9 o'clock, after the City Hall had been closed.

Mr. Hall is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hall of Evans Mills. His bride's aunt was the first Mrs. Empsall. The second Mrs. Empsall was reared in the Empsall household, wedding Mr. Empsall about three years after the first Mrs. Empsall's death.

On Mr. Empsall's death last year, Mrs. Empsall inherited $500,000. Their two children, Frank A. and Pauline, shared trusts in the $2,156,503 estate.

Mr. Empsall was the owner of the F. A. Empsall & Co. Department Store, the largest in the city, and was a stockholder and member of the board of the St. Regis Paper Company.

A dinner and dance will take place Wednesday night in the Rock Spring Country Club, West Orange. Each boy is assured of a dancing partner, recently chosen from members of this year's graduating classes of high schools in the Oranges and Maplewood.

Luncheon at the Hotel Suburban will follow the examination on Thursday. The group will spend that afternoon and evening, up to 11 o'clock in New York. After a boat ride to Coney Island, there will be swimming and a dinner at Manhattan Beach, preceding a visit to Luna Park. A sightseeing trip will conclude the day's activities. While awaiting the announcement of the successful candidate, to be made at Glenmont, on Friday at 11 A. M., the boys will be taken on an automobile ride through the Oranges. They will lunch at the Brooklyn Navy Yard and be received by Mayor Walker at 4:30 o'clock.

The inventor's son, Charles Edison, president of the Edison Industries, will be host to Dr. Hubert Howe. Dr. William Lowe Bryan, former president of the University of Indiana, and Mrs. Bryan, will be guests of Mrs. A. D. Smith of Llewellyan Park. George Eastman of Rochester, N. Y., probably will be a guest at Glenmont.

Another who will attend the contest is Wilbur Huston of Seattle, studeent at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, winner of last year's competition.

SEIZED IN MIDTOWN CHASE.

Salesman Fleeing "Attackers" Is Held as Intoxicated Driver.

After a wild early morning chase at sixty miles an hour in and out of several streets in the vicinity of Broadway between Fifty-eighth and Ninety-ninth Streets, which ended only after pursuing patrolmen had fired half a dozen shots, Dwight Otto, 25 years old, a salesman, of 244 West Ninety-ninth Street, was arrested yesterday on charges of driving while intoxicated. Later, in West Side Court, Magistrate Burke held him in $500 bail for arraignment in traffic court.

Otto said he had been attacked by several men in a speakeasy and mistook the police pursuers for his assailants and answered their commands to halt by driving faster.

CHEMICAL SOCIETY FINDS WORK COSTLY

Budget Has Grown in 25 Years From $15,000 to $557,000, President's Report Shows.

$486,000 FOR JOURNALS

Outside Aid Has Been Needed to Meet Expenses Because of Increase in Research.

The American Chemical Society has grown in membership during the last twenty-five years from 3,079 to 18,000 and has increased its budget from $15,000 to $557,000, according to a report by the society's president, Professor William McPherson of Ohio State University, made public yesterday.

The report shows that during 1930 about $486,000 will be spent on the society's journals. The net assets of the society exceed $300,000, in addition to trust funds totaling $233,851. In spite of these, the report says, American chemical research has resulted in such an increase of knowledge that the normal income of the American Chemical Society no longer permits it to continue the policy of recording all that is worthy in its three publications unless outside help is obtained.

"We have had this help during 1928 and 1929 through the subscriptions to chemical abstracts made by the industry and by the chemical foundation. In spite of this, the situation has become critical in 1930, valuable articles accumulating in the hands of the editors of our journals beyond the scope of funds allotted to handle them, so that The Journal of the American Chemical Society, and, in a less degree, Industrial and Engineering Chemistry, were distinctly behind in their programs.

"Again our directors presented the situation to Mr. Garvan and the Chemical Foundation supplied the funds necessary to bring the journals promptly up to date and to keep them up to date during 1930. Altogether some $95,000 was required beyond the normal income of the society for this purpose."

Chemical Abstracts, the journal in which are recorded the results of research obtained through a world-wide reporting system centring at Ohio State University, is said in the report to be undergoing expansion that requires permanent financing "if America is to keep abreast of scientific knowledge in all countries."

"The society," Professor McPherson says, "has reached its limit because the expenditure of wealth and brains to produce knowledge is out of proportion to funds available to record it."

MAIL BAN ON HERB CONCERN

Fraud Order Issued Against Company in San Francisco.

A copy of a fraud order against the Chinese Herb Company of San Francisco, its head and other members of the concern, issued last Wednesday by the Postmaster General of the United States, was made public yesterday by the City Health Department through Edward F. Brown, Special Deputy Health Commissioner. Its publication by the Health Department, he explained, is in furtherance of its educational campaign against medical quackery.

The order prevents the company, which had been operating under several names, from doing any further business through the mails. The postmaster at San Francisco is forbidden to pay any money orders to the company and is directed to return all mail addressed to it to the sender, with the words: "Fraudulent. Mail to this address returned by order of Postmaster General."

Mr. Brown said that such companies exist in every city with a large Oriental population, and that it is surprising how many Occidental persons are deceived by such quackery as herb treatments. Only last February, he said, a Chinese herb company was forced out of business of selling love potions here by the Health Department.

The California concern, according to the report by Solicitor Horace J. Donnelly attached to Postmaster General Walter F. Brown's fraud order, sold "treatments" for $10 each, irrespective of the disease or ailment to be treated and its severity.

Mexican Supreme Court Jurist Calls the Monroe Doctrine Invasion of Rights.

FINDS HARMONY IS LACKING

He Also Mentions Racial Prejudices as Breeding Friction Between the Two Countries.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MEXICO CITY, July 26.—An exposition of United States and Mexican relations and a discourse as to methods to be adopted in view of the Monroe Doctrine was given last night to the Fifth Seminar, now in session here, by Salvador Urbina, member of the Supreme Court of Mexico.

Señor Urbina had been invited to express his views on the betterment of international relations by Dr. Herbert C. Herring, who for the fifth consecutive year has brought many visitors to Mexico City for the purpose of improving cultural relations between the United States and Latin-American countries.

Señor Urbina has been in Mexico's Supreme Court since 1923. Formerly he was Sub-Secretary of the Ministry of Finance. Later he was Mexico's chief spokesman at the last Pan-American Conference in Havana.

Disagreements Implied.

To speak of bringing about a better understanding between the United States and Mexico is to affirm, by implication, that there exist, or have existed, disagreements, said Señor Urbina in his opening remarks, and in substance he continued:

No one will deny that Mexican-American relations, greatly improved at the present moment to the point of friendly and serene discussion of international problems, reached a stage of menacing aspect at certain periods of recent years, due to successive revolutionary movements here, to legislative evolution in matters constitutional, and to the subsequent execution of the principles and novel precepts of the Constitution of 1917; above all, as regards petroleum, agrarian grants, and the prohibition of the acquisition of lands in Mexico by foreigners within particular zones.

In epochs more remote the differences reached such a condition of aggression that in 1847 Mexico lost almost half her territory. There does not exist a single case in world history where two neighboring countries have enjoyed constant peace; differences ranging from political to sanguinary warfare fill the history of such countries. France, Germany, Italy, Russia, the Balkans, China and Japan all furnish examples. But during a period of 150 years there has only been one war between Mexico and the United States—in 1847—and two armed, partial aggressions, in 1914 and 1916.

In my opinion, apart from geographical location, the main differences between our countries have been: First, common cause in the relations of Latin-America with the United States, and, second, those specially connected with Mexico.

Admits Lack of Harmony.

The first admits lack of harmony between Latin-American countries and the United States. And who does not know that? Writers, not only Latins, but Europeans, and even North Americans, have written of the antagonism between our northern sister and Latin America, of the future of our peoples in the face of her imperialism, of the Monroe Doctrine as exponent thereof, of the predominance of North America in Central America, and of her interference in South America.

As long as the Latin does not speak English, and the Saxon does not speak Spanish, the problem of respective governments in reaching an intellectual and commercial interchange will be difficult, for a mutual understanding of necessities and common problems will be lacking. My distinguished friend, Charles Evans Hughes, recognizes in his work, "Relations of the United States with Other Nations of the Western Hemisphere," that the question of language should not be considered unimportant.

Another obstacle, and a very difficult proposition to overcome, is racial prejudice. The North American people, despite its qualities of observation and liberality, is not yet free from racial prejudice, which has led to lamentable conclusions regarding Latin-Americans and especially Mexicans. I refer to classing the Latin as a foreigner, in some cases undesirable, and in others, if he is admitted to the Northern Republic, as subject to restrictions only to be described as humiliating.

On this point the situation has developed to an extent contrary to international law, for Latins and in particular Mexicans have been denied the right to enter the United States merely because of their being Latins or Mexicans. Such facts sink deep into the conscience of peoples, and, as years go by, have a tragic repercussion. They breed friction and not rapprochement.

Finds Another Prejudice.

Another racial prejudice is the belief that Latin-Americans are not capable of self-government. That is a psychological element which, perhaps, has originated many of the governmental acts of the United States toward Latin-American governments. Frequent upheavals in the life of Spanish-American nations, and their lack of foresight in finance—the product either of hereditary vices of their race or of lack of political experience—may have caused such prejudice. But a detailed study would show that such a conclusion is not a reality.

On our part we must confess racial prejudice also. We distrust the foreigner as a result of centuries of oppression and servitude.

It is painful to talk of affronts,

Sea Breeze Python Killed 200 Feet From Place of Escape

ROCHESTER, N. Y., July 26 (AP).—The Sea Breeze python is dead and life in the Lake Shore community, seven miles north of here, returned to normal today after a shot in the head had ended the life of the 20-foot 200-pound snake after eight days of stolen freedom. Residents and campers restricted their activities and scores of armed searchers combed the Lake Shore and woods while the python was at large.

The snake was discovered under a small wooden building occupied by a Sea Breeze Park fortune teller, 200 feet from the reptile and curio exhibit of Edward Hayes, from which it escaped July 18.

It betrayed itself by its hissing when a park concessionaire walked too near its hiding place. Captain R. H. Staines, director of the amusement park, killed the reptile with one shot.

BLAMES NEW TARIFF FOR TRADE LOSS HERE

Senator Copeland Takes Hoover to Task for "Vacant Piers and Deserted Roadstead."

FALL IN EXPORTS STRESSED

New Yorker Declares Hoover Derided Democratic Contention That This Would Result.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—Senator Copeland of New York, in a statement issued tonight through the Democratic National Committee, declared that the falling off in foreign trade at New York reflected in customs figures was greatly due to the tariff rates of the Hawley-Smoot bill.

Pointing to "the vacant piers and almost deserted roadstead" of New York Harbor, he contended that decreased business had cost New York an average of $42,500,000 a month. Indiscriminate tariff rates, he asserted, had intensified the commercial depression and in some degree was responsible for its continuance.

"The lack of discrimination in fixing tariff rates," Senator Copeland said, "has added to the distress of the present era of commercial depression and is in no small degree responsible for the continuance of the period of industrial woe."

"President Hoover made much in his campaign in 1928," he continued, "of the importance of foreign trade as an element of our national prosperity, boasted of its growth under his nursing as Secretary of Commerce, and announced that his election meant a further growth of this beneficent feature of our economic system. Moreover, he took great pains to argue that high tariffs did not tend to curtail imports. In his Boston speech particularly he derided the Democratic contention that raising tariff rates would reduce the volume of our imports, and scoffed at the contention that this inevitably involved a decrease in what we sell abroad.

Cites Customs Figures Here.

"When he signed the present tariff bill, he must have retained this peculiar theory of economics, for he showed no hesitancy in affixing his name, not only to a few rates which may have been justified but to certain schedules that heap an additional billion dollars to the already stiff burden of the cost of living this country is bearing. The circumstance that this is a period of curtailed income and of unemployment did not deter him.

"I do not have to go further than my own customs district of New York to learn what the mere threat of the new tariff law did to the trade of our greatest city.

"In 1928 there came into this district imports amounting to $1,950,058,000. The next year, 1929, this record of imports advanced to $2,152,716,000.

"The first four months of 1929, according to the figures of the statistical division of the Department of Commerce, brought $747,668,000 in imports to the New York customs district.

"Then the new tariff bill was launched. The Hawley draft in the House of Representatives was enough to dismay the importers. By the first of the year it was evident that the sky was the limit in tariff duties for the administration Senators and Representatives.

"During the first four months of this year, which is as far as the government figures have been compiled, New York's record of imports dwindled to $578,024,000. In other words, this district alone shows a falling off from last year's figures for the months of January, February, March and April of $169,644,000.

Shows Loss in Exports.

"The Grundy tariff has cost New York an average of nearly $42,500,000 a month. There is no doubt that this disastrous ratio is continuing.

"The vacant piers and almost deserted roadstead of the great harbor tell the story more dramatically than the government statistics.

"Now as to the President's contention that a falling off of imports does not necessarily mean a corresponding diminution in our sales abroad, let us take some account of the outgoing merchandise traffic from the port of New York.

"According to the government's figures, during January, February, March and April of 1929 we shipped out of that harbor $752,556,000 worth of American merchandise for sale abroad. During the past four months there went out from the same port $577,516,000 in American goods.

"Deducting the one from the other shows that our exports from this single port of the United States had diminished $255,040,000. This means we lost $42,500,000 a month in our import trade and nearly $64,000,000 a month in our export trade, in the face of the tariff bill which, according to its advocates, was to stabilize business and end the distress of the Hoover panic."

STRIFE IN 2 BOROUGHS SPLITS DEMOCRATS

Republicans Hope to Make Big Gains Here by Contests Among Queens and Richmond Rivals.

LYNCH VICTORY EXPECTED

Court to Act Tomorrow on His Fight With Rendt for Control of Staten Island Committee.

THEOFEL FACTION STRONG

Tammany Support Held Likely to Make Him Dominant at Flushing Meeting Tuesday.

This week will witness the culmination of factional fights within the Democratic organizations of two boroughs—Queens and Richmond. Both contests are being watched with interest by the Republicans, who in the coming Gubernatorial campaign are hopeful of benefiting materially in votes from strife in the opposition party as well as from recent disclosures reflecting on the Democratic administration of the City of New York.

In both conflicts the Democratic leadership of the borough is directly involved. In Richmond the courts will be the battleground this week in the fight between Borough President John A. Lynch and David S. Rendt, Commissioner of Public Works, superseded by Mr. Lynch as chairman of the Richmond County Democratic Committee at a special meeting of the committee last week.

The Democratic contest in Queens is between John Theofel, chairman of the executive committee of the Democratic County Committee, and James Butler, former Park Commissioner of Queens and chairman of the Queens County Democratic Committee. In this contest Tammany Hall is involved to a greater degree than in the factional fight in Richmond. A major engagement in the Queens strife will be fought at a meeting of the Democratic County Committee at the Flushing High School Tuesday night, called a month ago by Chairman Butler.

Queens Fight on Tammany Rule.

The Democratic fight in Queens is partly the result of the chaotic conditions within the party which grew out of the removal from office and ousting from the Democratic leadership of ex-Borough President Maurice Connolly, now serving a term in jail following the Queens sewer scandal. More immediately, however, the question of Democratic borough autonomy is involved. Opponents of John Theofel and his régime are charging that under his leadership the Queens County Democratic organization has been little more than an annex to Tammany Hall and that John F. Curry, Tammany chieftain, has been the de facto Democratic leader in Queens and Theofel merely his lieutenant.

County Chairman Butler and his ally in the fight, former Tax Commissioner Richard H. Williams, owe what political prestige they possess to the influence they were in a position to wield during the old Connolly régime. Chairman Butler is a brother-in-law of the former Borough President. Both Butler and Williams have been ousted from the positions they held by Mayor Walker in connection with the process of "harmonizing" and bringing in line with the organization men of influence who had been fighting Theofel. Former Borough President Bernard Patten, most influential of the leaders involved in the three-cornered fight over the nomination for Borough President in 1929 when Walker last ran for Mayor, fell heir to the park position Williams was forced to vacate.

The two borough contests, especially that in Queens, have lent color to the report that Tammany, with its own borough sustaining a loss of population that will lessen presentation in Congress, in the State Senate and the Assembly, as well as on the Democratic State Committee, is reaching out for political influence outside of Manhattan to retain a commanding position in city politics.

Tammany, it has been pointed out, is in a better position now than at any recent time to do so, since the Mayor, with all the vast city patronage to dispense, is loyal to Tammany and a man who on more than one public occasion has pledged himself to abide by the organization's decrees on patronage.

Theofel and Lynch Favored.

That Theofel and Borough President Lynch win the fights with which they are confronted is generally predicted. The meeting at the Flushing High School on Tuesday night was called by Chairman Butler to get majority support for a rule providing for elective leadership within the Democratic organization instead of the present system under which the executive chairman as well as members of the executive committee are appointed. Mr. Theofel has conceded that the system ought to be changed, but insists that the change should be deferred until after election of a new county committee at the September primaries.

In the Richmond contest both the Lynch and Rendt forces and the followers of Commissioner Rendt took their fight into the courts yesterday. Mr. Lynch obtained an order requiring Commissioner Rendt to show cause why he should not be compelled to turn over to him books and records of the Richmond County Democratic Committee in time for a meeting tomorrow night, when the county committee must issue its official call for the primaries. Mr. Rendt obtained another order directing Mr. Lynch to show cause why he should not be enjoined from functioning as chairman at the meeting tomorrow. Both orders were made returnable on Monday before Justice

Selah B. Strong of the Supreme Court, who issued them, in Brooklyn.

In the meantime the Republicans in Queens who at this time are threatened with a primary fight between the faction headed by Borough President George U. Harvey and the "regulars" under Joseph H. De Bragga, the outgoing county leader, are being subjected to pressure to present a united front against the divided opposition in the Autumn election.

John Holley Clark Jr., who has been endorsed for the Republican nomination for Surrogate and has been identified closely with the Harveyites is active in seeking to harmonize the Republican factions and Alan Fox who might be viewed as a spokesman for the Hoover wing of the party has been exhorting the Queens Republicans with a similar object, while William J. Marer, Republican State chairman has lent his own efforts to the cause of harmony.

FARM EXPERTS HERE STUDY OUR MARKETS

Group Going to Conference at Cornell Includes Delegates From Twenty Nations.

Agricultural economists from about twenty countries, who are delegates to the International Conference of Agricultural Economists to be held at Cornell University from Aug. 18 to 29, began a four-day program yesterday morning which will be devoted to New York and vicinity. The sight-seeing and inspection tour of the city, as well as the conference at Ithaca, will be under the auspices of the Department of Agriculture and Farm Management of Cornell.

Yesterday morning the delegates from England, Ireland, Australia, Germany, Poland, Finland, Russia and other European countries and from as far east as China and Japan, left the Hotel New Yorker, Eighth Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street, the headquarters of the party, and visited the Federal Reserve Bank, 33 Liberty Street. After seeing the New York Stock Exchange at work and hearing Jason Westerfield explain its functions, the delegates lunched at the Pepper Pot Restaurant, 146 West Fourth Street, and completed the day's program by a trip around Manhattan Island on a boat of the New York Central Railroad from Pier 25, North River, and a visit to the Roxy Theatre in the evening.

Tomorrow's program calls for an inspection of the markets of the city. Leaving the hotel at 3:15 A. M. under the direction of Earl A. Flansburgh of the State Agricultural Department, the visitors will view the piers facing on West Street to see how the produce is sent through the wholesale and jobbing markets to the retail stores. The fruit and vegetable auctions that have become such a fixed part of the marketing process in New York City will be thoroughly studied by the European economists, Mr. Flansburgh explained.

From the piers the delegates will walk through the Washington wholesale and jobbing market, inspect the Wallabout market in Brooklyn, the Pacific Egg Producers' Cooperative at 178 Duane Street, the Dairymen's League offices at 11 West Forty-second Street and will listen to a broadcast of daily market reports at station WEAF of the National Broadcasting Company, 711 Fifth Avenue.

Tuesday will be devoted entirely to the study of the production and handling of milk. At Newark the party will see a modern city plant equipped with the most up-to-date mechanism for bottling milk, and will inspect the Walker-Gordon Laboratory Company Farm at Plainsborough, N. J.

Delegates to the conference include:

George Dallas, M. P., London, England; Miss Persia Campbell, Melbourne, Australia; Kuro Kobayokawa, Tokio, Japan; A. Bridges, Oxford, England; O. Vopelius, University of Berlin, Germany; B. phases of municipal, State and national government, economics and in the cultural field. An attempt will be made to bridge the "gap between academic learning and its practical application."

"We know that in New York there are thousands of intelligent men and women who are in need of and desirous of the intellectual stimulation that can come only from study," said Miss Cleveland. "Lack of opportunity and direction often make the end of school days the end of the average person's education. Many people are awakened to desire for serious study only after their opportunities for education have ended. How often do we hear of college graduates who wish they could 'go all over again.'

"The Town Hall's new program, we hope, will supply this lack. It does not aim to provide short cuts to knowledge, nor education in capsule form. It will afford merely a chance for the sort of supplementary education that cannot be obtained satisfactorily through newspapers, magazines and the radio, nor conveniently in night schools and extension courses."

Miss Cleveland said men and women who are authorities in their fields of knowledge would be engaged for the work.

PUBLIC WORKS RISE CREDITED TO CITIES

Research Bureau Finds Jump of $1,500,000,000 in 6 Years Due to Higher Standards.

SCHOOL ITEM IS LARGEST

Construction in Centres of More Than 30,000, Exceeds One-fourth of Nation's Total.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—The marked increase in public works in this country, which had shown a rise last year to about $3,500,000,000 from somewhat less than $2,000,000,000 in 1923, is largely accounted for by the growth of our large cities with their demands for more schools and for better transportation, water supply, sewage and other urban facilities, states Dr. Leo Wolman in a survey on "Planning and Control of Public Works," recently made public with a report by the Committee on Recent Economic Changes.

"The pressure for permanent improvements is bound to continue," observes Dr. Wolman, "and their adoption is limited by the capacity of the governments to pay for them."

Dr. Wolman's survey was made at the suggestion of President Hoover by the National Bureau of Economic Research with the assistance of the Department of Commerce. It is a continuation of the one conducted by the bureau which was made public a year ago.

Though school building constitutes generally the largest single item of public work expenditures by cities, Dr. Wolman points out that paving and road building, lighting, sewage and water supply systems, tunnels, bridges, docks, piers and waterfront developments, account for the major part of the rise in the total expenditure for public improvements.

Outlying Areas Are Affected.

"In nearly every instance in this country," writes Dr. Wolman, "the rise of the large city has been followed by the growth of population in surrounding areas, with the result that these areas have undergone legal or de facto absorption. As a consequence of this movement, the standards of the public plant and equipment tend to rise over a widening territory and to penetrate constantly because of the habits and standards of an urban population into the rural areas.

"The prevailing level of wealth and income is notably higher in our urban than in our rural areas; and has tended to become relatively more so. Municipal expenditure for public improvements, consequently, has come to reflect the mounting standards of living of the population in these communities for whom the improvements are made.

"Advanced standards of school buildings and hospitals, improved sanitary provisions, better lighting systems, the widening and resurfacing of city streets, extensions of park systems, are all items in the expenditures of cities that increase with the rise of incomes of the urban population."

Dr. Wolman estimates that the expenditures for public construction by cities with a population of 30,000 and over now amount to more than one-fourth of the total expenditures for public works in the country, and that this proportion would be even greater if expenditures for highways, financed largely by State, county and Federal governments, were taken out of the total.

Planning Increases Volume.

"Working in the same direction is the tendency, throughout American local government, to create city and regional planning commissions whose function it is, among other things, to plan the future construction programs of public agencies. For the most part, these commissions occupy only an advisory position, but their incorporation into the administrative branches of government would appear to be only a matter of time. While the centralized planning and execution of programs of public construction should lead to great economies in administration all along the line, the total effect of planned and far-reaching programs of public works should be an increase in their gross volume.

"A fundamental factor limiting the amount of expenditure on future projects is, of course, the capacity of the government to pay. In many small American cities, towns and even States, whose expenditures for capital improvements have since the war been large, future outlays on the same or higher levels depend on a growing population, expanding industry and trade, and a steady increase in the assessed valuation of property. This condition, however, is not universal and where such growth is not found the program of public works is more likely to be curtailed than expanded.

TEXT OF ATTACK ON OUR POLICIES

but my analysis must be impartial and pitiless when addressing the Seminar, which seeks the betterment of international relations.

Our object is to know, as far as possible, the causes which are impeding a better understanding between our countries, in order to eliminate them. Here enters the Monroe Doctrine.

Refuses to Recognize Doctrine.

For Mexico that doctrine does not exist. Mexico will forever refuse recognition of it, nor will she even discuss it. To publicists of Latin America it is and always has been an infantile theory to cloak a tutelage on the part of the United States over Latin America.

Recent problems between the United States and Mexico, including the petroleum question and Mexican legislation on it, have now been settled satisfactorily. We hope that the agrarian problem will also find a settlement in the near future. The establishment of the general and special claims commission is showing and will show Mexico's good-will in meeting international obligations.

There are no economic interests between Mexico and the United States such as provoked the Great War. There are, however, two points on which Mexicans feel intensely. The first is the question of Mexican immigration into the United States and the second is that of tariffs.

Mexican petroleum may be in future a problem for both countries, but its seriousness may be discounted considerably by the fact that the exploitation of Mexican oil is largely in the control of American companies.

Discusses Debt Question.

The question of Mexico's public debt should not be an insuperable barrier in the betterment of relations. In the first place, that is a matter of loans, not from government to government, which would justify direct intervention, but from private individuals to the Mexican Government. The fact that Mexico might be unable to continue payment of interest and amortization on bonds would never justify diplomatic action by a government in favor of private bondholders.

Mexican universities and those of the United States should intensify interchange of languages. To eliminate racial prejudices there must be an intense, tenacious and calm effort. If the Monroe Doctrine continues to prove a source of difficulty, let it be abandoned in good time, for it is not in agreement with the rights of peoples. It is an anachronism. If constant diplomatic reclamation in the name of individual interests continues to be the cause of bad understanding, abolish it forever and thus leave governments only to handle cases authorized by international right. If the protection of lives and property is to be understood as a security for successful business, and such threatens relations between nations, rectification of such conditions is imperative. The future holds for our two nations a great mission of peace and concord in the name of two great races. Mexico and the United States must learn and understand their high destinies.

DAVISON WILL INSPECT ARMY AIR CORPS FIELDS

Flight of 10,000 Miles From Coast to Coast and Lakes to Gulf Begins Wednesday.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—F. Trubee Davison, Assistant Secretary of War for Aeronautics, will leave here Wednesday for a 10,000-mile inspection tour of army air corps activities which will take him from the Mexican to the Canadian borders and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The tour will be made in a "fleetster," latest and fastest army transport plane, which has a cruising speed of 145 miles an hour.

Major Delos C. Emmons of Kelley Field and H. J. Adamson of Brooks Field, will accompany the Assistant Secretary. Captain Ira C. Eaker will pilot the plane.

The first stop will be made at Montgomery, Ala., where a tactical school is being constructed at Maxwell Field. The next day the party will proceed to Galveston, Texas, with a luncheon stop-over at Shreveport, La., where Mr. Davison will confer with officials supervising details for the new home of the Third Attack Group.

At San Antonio, headquarters of the Eighth Corps Area, Mr. Davison will inspect Randolph Field as well as the older training schools at Kelley and Brooks Fields. He will then fly to San Diego. The next stop will be March Field, California.

At Sacramento Mr. Davison will thank State and local officials for their cooperation in the army air corps manoeuvres last April. At San Francisco he will examine the site selected for the Seventh Bombardment Group in Marin County.

At Seattle he will inspect progress on contracts awarded to the Boeing Company. The party will then journey to Nogales, Ariz., by way of Salt Lake City. In Nogales Mr. Davison will address an American Legion convention. After going to Scott Field, near St. Louis, he will visit the air corps material division at Dayton and then proceed to New York by way of Buffalo.

AMERICANS VISIT MOSCOW.

Around-World Tourists, 400 Strong, Get All Taxis and Stir Curiosity.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, July 23.—Moscow has witnessed unusual scenes in the past wild fifteen years, but for a sheer unadulterated paradox there is nothing to be compared with the arrival here this week of "the first and second Corinthians," as some wag christened the invasion on two successive days by two groups of tourists, each 200 strong, from the round-the-world cruiser Carinthia, which reached Leningrad a few days ago.

The Soviet press announced boldly: "More than 400 American tourists, mostly rich capitalists, are now visiting Moscow." Under the efficient auspices of the Soviet tourist bureau "Intourist" (which some unkindly persons translate as "taking tourists in," although the word is really compounded from inostranetz, meaning foreigner and tourist), the visitors were met and consistently accompanied during their three days' stay by all the available taxis in Moscow, lodged at the Grand Hotel, taken to the Kremlin, theatres, factories, clubs, parks and shown everything, even the prisons.

Neither the food nor the accommodations were up to the Ritz standard, but Moscow gave them the best it had.

W. W. MILLER BREAKS LEG.

New York Lawyer in Paris Hospital After Being Hit by Taxi.

PARIS, Sunday, July 27 (AP).—William Wilson Miller, 60, of 470 Park Avenue, New York, is in the American Hospital here suffering from injuries received in a traffic accident.

It was reported that Mr. Miller suffered a fractured leg when he was struck by a taxicab late Friday night.

William Wilson Miller, head of the law firm of Hornblower, Miller and Garrison, is one of the best known attorneys in New York. He has been active in general practice for more than thirty years. He represented the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad at the receivership hearings here in 1926 and has handled problems covering nearly every variety of litigation. Much of his time in recent years has been spent in travel abroad.

COSTA RICA'S TRADE ACUTELY DEPRESSED

Chief Hope Is Placed in New Banana Contract Signed by the President.

PRESSURE PUT ON CONGRESS

Immediate Approval of Deal Urged—Customs Receipts Decline One-fourth for 1930.

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

SAN JOSE, C. R., July 21.—Costa Rica is suffering from the effects of the economic depression to the same extent as other countries in Latin-America, with the added disadvantage that other local factors have produced a trade and financial situation which daily becomes more acute. As the general prosperity of the country is almost entirely dependent upon the coffee crop, when this suffers to any extent, as has been the case for the last two years, everything suffers.

In the general opinion of all but a few self-styled Nacionalistas, the so-called society of the APRA, and a daily lessening number of members of the local Civic League, the only thing that will do much to bring about a renewal of general confidence will be the passing by Congress of the new banana contract just entered into by the President and the United Fruit Company, to overcome the effects of the law passed by a previous Congress fixing what is called an unreasonable export tax on bananas, to go into effect on Oct. 30, 1930. Many men of affairs here attribute a great part of the present critical situation to this law. Some Costa Rican politicians are against the entry of foreign elements or capital, particularly American; but apparently a reaction is taking place.

Action by Congress Urged.

So much pressure has been brought to bear toward having the contract receive favorable action by Congress that should the contract fail to pass it is difficult to say what the consequences will be. Many feel that the contract will be an important factor in immediately bringing about a renewed feeling of confidence.

The present administration is daily censured for its alleged wasteful methods, and much "washing of dirty linen" is daily indulged in by certain enemies of the administration in Congress.

Congress, perhaps to embarrass the government, has just passed a law based on the alleged wasteful consumption of government gasoline and the unofficial use of its automobiles, retiring from service all of the official automobiles except that used by the President, another for the Secretary of Foreign Affairs for exclusive use at diplomatic functions, and such "runabouts" as may be absolutely necessary in connection with road construction work.

All others previously in use are to be auctioned to the highest bidder within thirty days after date of the decree. The President returned the decree to Congress with certain exceptions and a request for reconsideration, but it was passed, nevertheless.

Customs Receipts Drop.

Present indications are that the customs receipts for the calendar year 1930 will be fully 25 per cent less than those for 1929, and all other government receipts are falling off to an equal or greater degree. However, the various departments are economizing in every direction, the policy being one of reduction of salaries rather than of force. Nevertheless, so many of the artisan and laboring classes have been dropped that want among them is evident. Many of those whose salaries have been reduced express dissatisfaction because the salaries of the higher-ups have not received equal treatment.

Although Congress authorized the re-entry of Costa Rica into the League of Nations it allows final decision to rest with the President, when and under such reservations as he may consider advisable. Costa Rica failed to pay her quota in 1921, 1922 and 1923, for which she was placed on the list of delinquents. Later on, through the efforts of a South American diplomat, the quota was fixed at $5,000 per annum, conditional upon Costa Rica remaining in the League. In the latter part of 1924 Costa Rica declared remaining tion of retiring from the League and did so in January, 1927. During Costa Rica's permanence in the League she paid $18,667.87 in quotas, these payments having been effected in instalments in the years 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925.

CINCINNATI PAPER TO BUILD NEW HOME

The Times-Star Plans a Plant That Will Compare Favorably With Any in America.

TO HAVE 15-STORY TOWER

Work to Start Next Spring—Announcement Expresses Faith in Business Future.

Plans for the erection of a building next Spring to increase the publishing facilities of The Cincinnati Times-Star, were announced yesterday. The Times-Star said the plans were announced early because of business conditions, explaining, "The Times-Star wants to place itself on record, squarely, at this particular moment as being not afraid either of the future of the United States or of the city of Cincinnati."

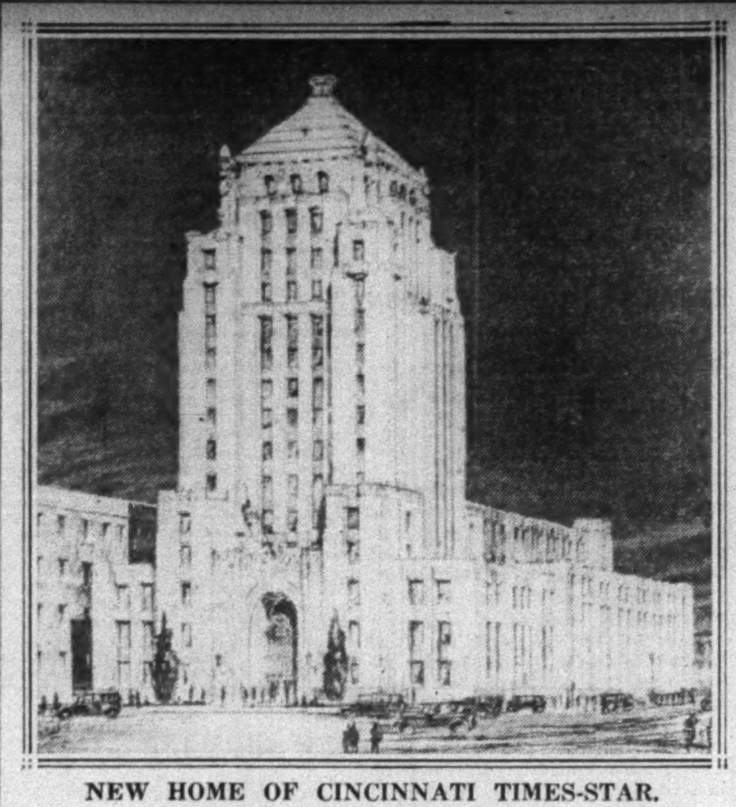
The site for the new building is made up of the entire half block bounded by Broadway, Eighth Street, Eggleston Avenue and Bedinger Street. According to the announcement, if progress on the innumerable details of the erection of a newspaper plant is up to expectations, the old buildings on the property at the northeast corner of Eighth and Broadway will be torn down in February, 1931, and work on the new structure will begin in March.

Working drawings now being made by Samuel Hannaford & Sons, architects, call for a main structure five stories in height from the Broadway level, or seven stories high from the level of Eggleston Avenue. At the Broadway end of the building there will be a tower fifteen stories in height of steel construction. The rest of the building will be concrete and the exterior surface of the entire structure will be of Indiana limestone. The building will be set back fifteen feet from the property line at Broadway.

The announcement says that a few stories in the tower above the sixth floor probably will be rented but that the rest of the building will be used by The Times-Star. The basement, under the entire site, will be used for paper storage, giving enough capacity for publication over a two months' period. Print paper will be delivered direct into the new building over the Pennsylvania tracks.

Above the basement, plans call for a garage large enough to house all The Times-Star trucks. Above that, in succession, will be the mailing room, the press room, the composing room and the news room. The advertising department, the business offices and some of the editorial offices will be in the tower.

When the work is completed, the newspaper expects to have a new home that will compare favorably with the best and most modern newspaper plants in any American city. Pointing out that The Times-Star previously has been published in two locations, the newspaper says that the growth of the city, the increase of traffic and the demand for more space, are responsible for the proposed move.



NEW HOME OF CINCINNATI TIMES-STAR.
Proposed Building, to Be Erected Next Spring, Will Be Seven Stories High, With a Fifteen-Story Tower.

WAR ON TOBACCO REPORTED

Anti-Fascisti Said to Be Cutting Italian Revenues by Abstention.

According to reports from Italy reaching Germany and printed by the Berlin Vorwärts on July 4, the high price of tobacco and cigarettes is being used by the anti-Fascisti as the occasion for a somewhat effective protest against the régime headed by Benito Mussolini. Anti-tobacco campaigns are said to be under way in many parts of Italy and the sales of cigarettes are falling off rapidly, with a consequent loss of revenue to the State.

It is averred that in Ozieri, one of the main towns of Sardinia, practically all of the male inhabitants recently assembled in the market place and consigned their pipes to the flames. From Celano, in the Abruzzi, a package of pipes was mailed to Premier Mussolini. In Naples students are said to have been arrested for having snatched cigarettes from smokers' mouths. To counteract this anti-tobacco drive, the government is said to have threatened to impose new taxes on other articles of daily consumption, and in the factories of Genoa signs have been posted proclaiming that non-smokers are betraying their fatherland.

QUEZON WILL PRESS FIGHT IN CONGRESS

President of Philippine Senate to Go to Washington to Seek a Definite Status.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MANILA, July 26.—Manuel Quezon, President of the Senate, in his first statement since being confined to his home by illness several months ago, last night announced policies concerning the Philippines and his own political future. He said he and his family would leave for the United States on Aug. 2, to remain until some definite status was determined for the islands, and in the event he met with failure he would retire from public life.

Señor Quezon said the political future of the Philippines was dark and gloomy.

"Patriotism we now have," he said. "It is statesmanship that we should bring to bear on the Filipino problem. The courageous statesman sees the facts as they are, and thinks more of the future than of the present, more of our children than of ourselves. We must have a determination of our status."

Senator Quezon indicated he would leave his post as President of the Senate to Senator Sergio Osmena.

Declaring that members of the Philippine mission at Washington had done all humanly possible, he expressed the opinion that his full knowledge of present conditions would aid in obtaining from Congress a statement of the definite status of the Philippines for the future.

He sees no indication of independence for a number of years, but he hopes to establish points leading to autonomy in later years. He indicated he would remain in the United States two or more years in an effort to obtain tangible results for the islands.

Señor Quezon admitted that, "whether we like it or not, we must remember that America is the sovereign power. Whatever may develop, that is the outstanding fact we must consider."

WRECK SCENE NOW FENCED.

Pennsylvania Railroad Completes Barriers at Danger Spots.

Special to The New York Times.

ELIZABETH, N. J., July 26.—Workmen completed today the second of two sections of fencing designed to protect dangerous spots along the right of way of the Pennsylvania Railroad. One, at New York Avenue and De Hart Place, marks the point where, last Saturday night, an automobile drove over the unprotected station platform onto the tracks, causing the derailment of a Pennsylvania express and the death of one man and the injury of sixty-nine other persons. The second is at Grove Street and Enrico Avenue, where similar conditions existed.

In each case a wooden fence has been erected and painted with diagonal stripes.

Twenty-one of the fifty-five victims admitted for treatment at the St. Elizabeth and Elizabeth General Hospitals are still held as patients.

FINDS PACIFIC KEEN TO WORLD PROGRESS

Leader of Australian Women, on Way to Honolulu Session, Sees Views Changing.

DEPLORES EASTERN APATHY

Says Women of Asia Are Avid for Lessons From America on Social and Health Problems.

Dr. Georgina Sweet, prominent Australian biologist and honorary lecturer in the veterinary department of the University of Melbourne, who passed through the city yesterday on her way to Honolulu, where she is to head the delegation of Australian women at the Pan-Pacific Women's Conference, Aug. 9 to 23, gave an interview about the significance of the conference, during which she expressed her conviction that "much of the world's evolution is passing rapidly from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean."

This will be the second conference of its kind to be held. It will be attended by delegates from the United States, Hawaii, Australia, New Zealand, China, Japan, Canada, the Philippines, Samoa, Tahiti, Fiji, India and the Dutch East Indies. Each country is entitled to twenty-five delegates and six associates, though it is doubtful, Dr. Sweet said, that the full quota will be sent in each case. The conference is financed by the Pan-Pacific Union, which also financed the first one, in Honolulu in 1928.

"The subjects to be discussed at the conference," said Dr. Sweet, "will cover the life of a human being from embryo to old age. The discussions will be under five main divisions—health, education, industry, social service and women in government, and will include pre-natal, infant, school age, adolescent and adult life. Other topics will deal with the relation of the cinema to education, home economies and many more subjects of vital interest to every woman.

"American women, especially those of the Eastern States, have not displayed the same feeling toward the Pan-Pacific Conference as do the women of the Pacific countries. The same attitude is true of the women of the western part of Australia. These women seem to think that there is no need of a separate women's conference of a general nature at this stage of development. They do not seem to realize the significance of continental contacts.

"There is no doubt that the focus of much of the world's evolution is moving rapidly from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. You may grant that in the eastern part of the United States we have ceased to separate men's and women's interests in our minds. But in the Oriental countries women have not had the same chance of finding their interests in community and national life as have the women of the older and more advanced countries.

"So the women of the more backward countries around the Pacific may see in this conference a means by which they may find their feet, as it were, in discussion with women of other lands of those problems with which they are more especially and more immediately concerned. The women of Japan, for instance, are keenly interested in America's methods of reducing the infant mortality rate, for theirs is distressingly high. Others are seeking information on how to improve their standards of living. They want to know how we educate our small children, and a thousand and one other things.

"One of the main topics to be discussed is whether it is feasible to hold future conferences. The Pan-Pacific Union exists largely for the initiation of conferences of special or general nature, but this is the only time when they have financed a second one of the same kind."

Dr. Sweet was the first scientist to make a survey of parasites in Australia and for many years was Associate Professor of Biology in the University of Melbourne, where she received her degree of Doctor of Science in 1904. She resigned in 1927 and has since devoted a large part of her time to the National Y. W. C. A. in Australia, of which she is the president. She left yesterday for Toronto, from where she will go to Vancouver and San Francisco to join the American delegation.

KNOWS VINEGAR FROM WINE.

Philadelphia Woman Magistrate Refuses Prisoner's Plea.

PHILADELPHIA, July 26. (AP).—Mrs. Violet Fahnestock, Philadelphia's only woman police magistrate, said she knew the difference between vinegar and wine when Michael Castelano was before her today on a liquor violation charge. Police said the liquid in evidence contained 14 per cent alcohol.

"That wasn't wine; that was vinegar," said the prisoner.

"You can't fool me on vinegar," said the magistrate, "I've used too much in cooking and I never saw any that contained 14 per cent alcohol. Five hundred dollars bail for court."

GEN. SCOTT TO MAKE INDIAN SIGN RECORD

Soon to Begin Task of Listing Details of Inter-Tribal "Language" of Plains.

MOVIES TO AID IN WORK

Congress Voted $5,000 for Purpose of Retired Army Officer—He Tells of Experiences.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., July 26.—A permanent record of the sign language of the American Indian will be produced partly in moving pictures for the United States Government by General Hugh L. Scott, an authority on Indian inter-tribal language. General Scott, one-time Chief of Staff of the United States Army, now retired, who is chairman of the Highway Commission of New Jersey, will leave his home in Princeton soon to start work on a complete record of the language.

Representative Leavitt of Montana, chairman of the House Committee on Indian Affairs, introduced a bill, passed on July 3, which appropriated $5,000 to aid General Scott in preparing a record of the sign language which was used by all tribes of the American plains.

While much of the work will be done in the East, either in New York or Washington, General Scott plans to make a trip to the Blackfoot Reservation, where he will invite Indian representatives from a dozen tribes to meet so that their common language may be recorded by camera.

Twenty Years on Plains.

"It was in 1876," General Scott said, "that I first began to study the American Indian. I graduated from West Point on June 14 and at that time there were no vacancies open, but Custer's last stand took place on June 25 and there were many vacancies in the Seventh Cavalry following the battle. I got my appointment on June 26 and was sent West immediately, where I lived for twenty years in the plains among different Indian tribes.

"At first I learned the language of the Sioux because I thought that since the Sioux were so great and powerful their language would be the court language of the plains, serving the Indian as French serves us in the diplomatic world. But I found that the court language of the plains was not a vocal language at all but a sign language which was common to all tribes east of the Rocky Mountains and south of the Saskatchewan River to Old Mexico.

"This langauge I found was a rich, expressive language which was much older than white man's existence in America—a simple language void of all grammar and parts of speech. All expressions of thought in the inter-tribal language are made by gestures of the two hands within a two-foot radius of the speaker's head. The language is based fundamentally upon imitation of arts and qualities.

Talk Without Speaking.

"This wonderful language had diffused over the American plains among Indian tribes chiefly due to the wanderings of the Indian who followed the buffalo in search of new grassy country. There are some fifty-six Indian languages in America north of Mexico and over 300 dialects, so when Indians met Indians with whom they could not converse by speech they learned to master a language of signs which was thoroughly understandable to all.

"In 1878, during the Cheyenne expedition in Nebraska, I remember having talked with some Indian prisoners of war. We conversed in the inter-tribal language and I learned that one of the Indians had been to Washington once, where he had seen a circus. He described the whole incident so vividly that all of the Indians understood perfectly that a white man had jumped across the backs of five white horses and that an elephant, an animal which none of the others had ever seen, had performed.

"I lived in Oklahoma for eight years and during the time I conversed fluently with Indian friends, to some of whom I never uttered a sound. Often they would come to visit me and we would talk for hours in one room without my wife in the next room hearing a sound except when we laughed at each other's stories.

Sign Words Cover Everything.

"Of all races that I have ever known, the American Indian is the most skilled in language. With his sign language he can express clearly and quickly ideas that are complex and abstract; in fact, every mental conception which his civilization permits him to entertain.

"The Indian today has sign words for every modern thing. Any Indian of the plains can meet an Indian of different dialect and talk fluently with him about air planes, automobiles and radio. When the Indians of a dozen different dialects meet me on the Blackfoot Reservation for the recording of the language in moving pictures, without ever having seen a movie camera with sound apparatus they will talk to themselves about it. I have in my life talked with the same signs to members of every tribe on the American plains."

The trusted friend of Indians throughout the country, General Scott has been sent many times on delicate diplomatic missons to obtain understandings with various tribes. The last time that he was sent by the government to hold conference with Indians was in 1916, when he settled peacefully an Indian dispute in Utah.

The bill passed by Congress places at his disposal if he needs it cooperation from the Smithsonian Institution of Washington.

POPULAR EDUCATION IN SOUTH AFRICA HAILED

Prof. Snedden Tells Columbia Audience It Eclipses Most Progressive System Here.

South Africa is even more devoted to the cause of public education than the most progressive States of the United States, Professor David Snedden told an audience of Columbia University Summer session students yesterday in recounting some of the results of an extensive survey of South Africa which he recently made.

"In South Africa," he said, "a white population of slightly over 1,500,000 is in control of the mines, railways and a large proportion of the land. They live in a strange sort of cooperation with nearly four times as many natives.

"These natives, never called Negroes in South Africa, are composed largely of Bantu peoples, large proportions of whom came to South Africa from Equatorial Africa years after the Dutch and English made their first settlements. The original South Africa natives, Bushmen and Hottentots, have disappeared, leaving in their wake a blended population containing much Malay blood. The 4,000,000 natives are descended from warrior invaders."

The situation of these 4,000,000 Bantu people is the most serious problem that South Africa has to face, Professor Snedden said. Their standards of living are low, but they are slowly improving due to the experience of the thousands of young men who gather at the great mines of Johannesburg each year for work which is fairly well paid.

Although considerable feeling still exists between descendants of English and Dutch settlers, the white sections of the population are slowly fusing, he asserted.

"Immigration of Europeans is very strictly regulated," Professor Snedden continued"; in fact, even British or Netherlanders without capital are excluded.

"Very large proportions of the whites are intensely interested in politics. Even 'small town' newspapers report Parliamentary debates."

SAYS SUSPECT ADMITS HE IS 'SCREEN BURGLAR'

Yonkers Police Chief Announces Confession of Man Held After Entering Fireman's Home.

Chief of Police Quirk of Yonkers announced yesterday that William Green, 21 years old, arrested at daybreak after an attempt had been made to rob the apartment of Fire Captain Henry Kolb at 420 McLean Avenue, Yonkers, had admitted that he was responsible for a series of screen burglaries in Yonkers recently. City Judge Boote ordered Green held without bail.

The arrest followed a report made to the police by Captain Kolb that he had been awakened by an intruder, who fled after he had entered the home by removing a screen. Nothing was stolen from the apartment, an investigation showed.

A squad of policemen, sent to the Kolb home immediately, seized Green in the neighborhood and locked him up on a charge of suspicion.

A series of burglaries in Westchester County have been reported to the police which were committed by a man who entered homes by removing screens and who has become known as the "screen burglar."

SNAKE "YARNS" EXPLODED.

W. H. Carr's New Nature Book Dispels Several Popular Beliefs.

Several popular beliefs are exploded by William H. Carr, assistant curator of education in the American Museum of Natural History, in a book just released entitled, "The Stir of Nature." For example, Mr. Carr writes:

"Snakes will not live until sundown, when their heads have been cut off; they do not milk cows; nor do they have poison darts in the ends of their tails—these are some of the ancient yarns about snakes which every country boy used to believe firmly and which many folks still insist to be true but which have no scientific basis at all."

Much of the material in the book resulted from the author's study of the Bear Mountain and Harriman State Parks over the past twenty years. As a Boy Scout at Kanawauke Lakes, Mr. Carr learned at first hand the lessons taught by the flora and fauna of this 47,000-acre semi-wilderness preserve.

The book is dedicated to young American naturalists. Published by the Oxford University Press, it has a foreword by Dr. Clyde Fisher, director of the department of education of the American Museum of Natural History.

Special to The New York Times.

Y., July 26.—Out of 7,300 New York National Guardsmen moving between armories and training camps, about 5,500 got under way today in special trains, although the new encampments will not actually open until Sunday afternoon. Major Gen. William N. Haskell, commanding General of the Guard, and other division staff officers provided sleeping cars on the special trains for those who must travel long distances.

Colonel William R. Pooley led the 1,250 men of the 174th Infantry of Buffalo out of Camp Smith, Peekskill, and the advance detachment of the 108th Infantry of Rochester, Auburn, Geneva, Syracuse, Medina, Hornell, Ogdensburg, Watertown and Elmira, under Colonel John S. Thompson, arrived in camp.

The Seventy-first Infantry of Manhattan, which with the 174th makes up Brig. Gen. George R. Dyer's brigade, leaves camp under command of Colonel Walter Delamater on Sunday, and the 107th Infantry of Manhattan, led by Colonel Ralph Tobin, will replace them in Camp Smith soon after they depart.

The 105th Field Artillery of Manhattan and Brooklyn, under Colonel Clarence Higginson, left Pine Camp today for home, and the 104th Field Artillery of Jamaica, L. I., Binghamton and Syracuse, under Colonel Charles Blakeslee, started for Pine Camp.

The 244th Coast Artillery of Manhattan, under Colonel Lewis M. Thiery, left Fort Ontario for home and will be replaced by the 258th Field Artillery of the Bronx, commanded by Colonel Paul Loeser.

The activities centre in Earl Hall. They include addresses, discussions, chapel services and conferences. "International Friendship" is the theme of many addresses. The lecture staff is composed of clergy of the principal denominations, educators and representatives of international organizations.

Among the students are Protestants, Catholics and Jews from this country, Canada, South America and Europe; Buddhists and Confucianists from China, Japan and India; Hindus and Mohammedans from Asia and the Near East, and members of the Russian and Greek Orthodox Churches.

As a supplementary service to the students seeking information regarding religious activities in the university and among New York churches, a headquarters has been set up at Teachers College.

Addresses and discussions under the auspices of the religious activities groups of the Summer session will include a public symposium in the Horace Mann Auditorium on Wednesday evening on "A Better Understanding of Our International Life." VOIDS SCHOOL ELECTION.

Jersey Official Throws Out Vote on $465,000 Building Bonds.

TRENTON, N. J., July 26.—Holding that minor markings did not destroy the validity of the ballot, Dr. Charles H. Elliott, State Commissioner of Education, today declared void an election in the school district of Hasbrouck Heights which was to authorize $465,000 in bonds for the erection of a new school house. The original count was 633 in favor and 631 against the proposition. The commissioner, however, included six ballots which had minor markings, thereby defeating the proposal by 635 to 634.

George T. Winne Jr., a taxpayer, appealed the decision of the school board approving the plan after throwing out twenty-eight votes on the ground that certain acts of the board and election officials constituted illegal procedure, but the commissioner ruled both bodies had substantially followed the requirements.

Citing the section of the school law regulating elections, Commissioner Elliott said that "a cross must be placed in the square before the word 'yes' or 'no' in order that a vote may be counted, but in the absence of a provision that another mark upon a ballot shall disqualify the vote the ballot should be counted as marked with a cross in the square."

POPE RECEIVES AMERICANS.

Gives Audiences to Pittsburgh and Cincinnati Groups and Carmelites.

VATICAN CITY, July 26 (AP).—Three American pilgrimages today were received in audience by Pope Pius.

Cox; another of Knights of Columbus from the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, Ohio, numbering forty-five, presented by the Rev. Louis G. Reinhold, and 130 American Carmelites directed by the Rev. Father Sullivan, made up the delegations.

The Carmelites were making a pilgrimage to the Shrine of St. Therese at Lisieux.

Fifty Argentine midshipmen from the schoolship Sarmiento also were received with a group of officers and diplomats from that country.

Educator Finds 1 in 8 Ends College Course Of Those Rated in Lower Half at High School

Observations over a period of years show that only one student in eight who ranks in the lower half of his high school class is able to complete an ordinary college course, Dean Max McConn of Lehigh University, visiting lecturer in college administration at the Columbia University Summer session, said yesterday.

Many State universities are circumventing legal statutes requiring them to admit all graduates of accredited high schools by "advising" some students not to attend college and shunting others off from cultural and scientific courses into studies in the manual arts, he said.

"The period before 1875 was the Golden Age in American education," Dean McConn said. "During that era economic conditions were such that many positions were available without a college education. The only people who attended college in those days were natural students who loved learning for its own sake.

"By 1875 the rise of modern industry made training necessary. Students were stimulated to go to college for ulterior motives. In order to stem the barbarian invasion the better colleges set up systems of selection."

Dean McConn held that admission to college should be as highly selective as the circumstances of each particular institution will permit.

"The most effective method of college admissions is the system of selective certification," he said. "This means that a student can enter college on a certificate from high school if he is in the first half or first third, or any fraction that any particular institution may care to select, of his class. Thus a college can be as liberal or as exclusive as it desires. This plan has the additional advantages of requiring practically no administrative expense whatsoever."

All inflexible forms of selection were assailed by Dean McConn. The college admissions office should be de-mechanized and individualized, he said.

BROOKLYN BUDGET PUT AT $6,498,087

Hesterberg's Estimate for the Fiscal Year of 1931 Is $2,415 Less Than 1930 Figure.

NO PAY RISES PROVIDED

But Borough President Hopes They Can Be Given by Eliminating Unnecessary Workers.

The departmental budget for the office of the Borough President of Brooklyn requesting $6,498,087 to carry on the work of that office for the fiscal year of 1931 was transmitted to the Board of Estimate yesterday with a communication from Borough President Hesterberg pointing out his approval of a reduction of $2,415 under last year's budget. The present departmental budget is the first submitted by Mr. Hesterberg.

The Borough President suggested the possibility of future savings by the transfer of employes from one department to another, leaving certain vacancies unfilled and thereby allowing salary advances which are not requested in his budget.

"Some adjustments, however, are called for," he said yesterday. "An increase of about $90,000 is shown in personal service, about half of which is required for additional forces and the balance to make proper apportionment of salaries of engineering employes. The additional forces are required for the operation of the new magistrates' and municipal court building at Pennsylvania and Liberty Avenues.

"I am not asking for any salary increases. However, we shall continue our efforts so as to conduct the affairs of the office that if economies may be effected during the year through not filling the vacancies or the transfer of working units from one division to another to avoid adding to the force, we shall utilize these savings as heretofore in making warranted advances whenever possible.

"I do not think that it is noteworthy that despite the enlargement of our activities there has been a corresponding increase in the cost of the service imposed on us, and we shall continue to adhere to this policy of economy so long as the proper management of the business of the office makes it possible to do so."

A summary of the budget as compared with that submitted for 1930 follows:

BATTLESHIP UTAH WINS TWO AWARDS

Capt. Train, Hoover's Aide, Commanded Craft Which Receives Engineering Trophy.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, July 26.—The engineering trophy for battleships for 1929-30 has been won by the Utah, the Navy Department announced today.

The Utah will receive not only the engineering trophy, the white "E," but, as she also made the greatest improvement in engineering in the battleship class, will receive prize money and the red "E."

She is thus authorized to paint both a white "E" and a red "E" on her stack.

Captain Charles R. Train, now aide to President Hoover, commanded the Utah during the competition year.

The battleship Mississippi is authorized to paint a red "E" on her stack to show that she was second with 98 per cent of the merit points of the trophy winner.

The light cruiser Memphis received the engineering trophy and the white "E" for the light cruiser class and also the prize for greatest improvement and the red "E" for her class.

The S-16 stood first in the submarine class and received the engineering trophy, the white "E" and prize money.

The submarine V-2 received the prize for the greatest improvement in engineering, the red "E" and prize money.

The submarine S-24 made the highest record in torpedoes in the submarine class and received prize money.

GERMAN HAMLET IS SINKING

In a Region of Old Coal Mines, It Is Said to Be Doomed by Caving.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WEISENFELS-ON-THE-SAALE, July 26.—Legends of sunken cities, treasure filled, perhaps, are among the world's favorite fairy tales. Before snow falls this year there is going to be a sunken village. Gaumnitz, on the road from here to Zeitz, has only a few months to live, it is said. Formerly it was one of the most prosperous farming villages around; now it sticks up out of a circular field which has sunk several yards as a result of the caving of old coal mines which surround the doomed village on all sides.

A makeshift road threads its way between gaping holes to the village. No one bothers to build a decent road to it. Church, schoolhouse and other worthwhile buildings are already being taken down and carted off. Children have a few months more to play in the streets, women but a little while to gossip at evenings on the doorsteps, men must be thinking where they will go next.

Gaumnitz may soon be penciled off the atlas, if the tiny dot indicating where 300 people will soon be homeless can be found.

SCOFFS AT RED PUPILS.

Yonkers Police Head Not Interested in 25 High School Radicals.

Safety Commissioner Frank B. Devlin of Yonkers, who has charge of the Police and Fire departments, declared yesterday that he did not take seriously the situation growing out of the discovery of Communist literature and alleged records purporting to show that some high school pupils in Yonkers were radicals.

"I have left the matter to the policemen," said Commissioner Devlin, "as I regard it as only routine work. I do not take it seriously."

Concerning reports that documents showing twenty-five high school children were Red sympathizers, Commissioner Devlin showed that, if this proved to be true, it was an inconsequential number, for there are 2,500 high school pupils in Yonkers.

The police will not make public the names of the suspected pupils. The documents were found in an empty store by Fred Kampfer, a World War veteran, who rented the place and reported the discovery to the police.

ENDS SLOANE'S ISOLATION.

Sing Sing Warden Increases Liberty of Youth Fighting for Release.

Special to The New York Times.

OSSINING, N. Y., July 26.—Warden Lewis E. Lawes today ordered Roy Sloane, 23 years old, who had been kept in isolation since accused of violating the rules of censorship and sending out a printed pamphlet, put in the prison yard.

Sloane, a former student of Columbia College, who once persuaded a jury to acquit him when he won a new trial in Westchester on a charge of being involved in automobile thefts, is serving a seven-year term for possessing brass knuckles in prison. He has lost many legal motions to try to have this charge set aside, as he did the original one, and now has obtained a habeas corpus writ that is returnable next Friday in United States District Court in Manhattan. He has lost all suits for release in State courts.

UGLY STATUES STIR PARIS.

But Suggestion for Their Removal Raises a Strange Objection.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 26.—There are, it appears, even Parisians who find that not everything in Paris is lovely. A movement has begun to have at least half the statues in the city removed, not only because they obstruct traffic but because most of them are ugly.

One suggestion was that they be collected and placed along a great new road which it is proposed to build from Paris to Saint Germain, but the suggestion brought immediate protest.

"Why spoil a good road" asked M. des Isnards, chairman of the Commission of Tourism of the Paris Municipal Council. What is wanted, he declared, is a dictator of good taste.

Story That Head of Imperialists Was Abducted to Moscow Is Now Discounted.

The denunciation of the head of the Russian Imperialists, General Alexander Paul Koutiepoff, who mysteriously disappeared from Paris last January, by Miss Ellen Wilkinson, Labor member of the British House of Commons, caused a large increase in the subscription fund banked in Paris to be used as rewards for information which should lead to the clearing up of the mystery. Miss Wilkinson's statement that the General's family had good reason for not desiring to trace him is said to have caused indignation among the Czarist émigrés in Paris, who again dug down into their pockets in hopes of causing her charge to be refuted in the only apparent way possible.

The accumulated rewards have now reached nearly 1,000,000 francs. From the very beginning of the mystery the Sûreté Générale, or national detective force of France, has repeatedly interrogated a former member of the late Czar's secret police, who was known to be absorbed in the case in the interests of Kerensky's paper, La Russia Opprimée, but could get nothing from him. Now he has spoken through the columns of his own little paper La Cause Commune, published irregularly every week or two and circulated among members of the Imperialist group. The Sûreté is said to be trying to check up his statements.

This former member of the Czarist detective force is Vladimir Burtsef, famous for his denunciation of the agent provocateur, Azef, and later a revolutionary of the Kerensky type and a keen anti-Bolshevist. According to his statment made in La Cause Commune, based on his accumulated information, General Koutiepoff died almost immediately after he had been kidnapped near his Paris domicile on Jan. 26, and lies buried near the roadside on the highway to Mantes-sur-Seine, thirty-six miles northwest of Paris, between which place and Evreux, on the Iton, which enters the Seine through the Eure, according to the police theory, a motor boat was waiting to take the abductors and their charge down to the mouth of the Seine, where a Russian ship was waiting.

Newest Police Theory.

The latest theory of the police which has been merely abbreviated, but not effaced, by Burtsef's revelations, in brief form runs as follows: On the night of Jan. 25 the abductors received their last orders from the OGPU agent, Ianovitch, alias Viliansky, in his apartment in the Soviet Embassy in the Rue de Grenelle. The General had lately been in Berlin, supposedly to meet members of the Imperialist party and their German friends, and to them he revealed his plans.

According to the communications sent by the Berlin police to the Sûreté, the men who met him were actually agents of the OGPU acting as agents provocateurs. No sooner did they possess his plans than Ianovitch was communicated with in Paris and the plot to kidnap him was created and every few days rehearsed and the actual spot near the General's home was selected—still something seemed to be wanting, which was remedied by the ingenious Ianovitch.

According to the Sûreté, the plotters knew perfectly well that General Koutiepoff could not be captured by force, whereas if a policeman in uniform accosted any Russian, however highly placed, and requested him to accompany him to headquarters there would be no trouble. Hence the bogus policeman, which was Ianovitch's inspiration. The bogus policeman was passed by a genuine inspector but as the former wore the badge of another division he merely saluted and was allowed to pass on. The police deduce from certain features of their information that the car bearing the General and his captors was held up by traffic and that then the victim realized for the first time that he was not on the right way to headquarters. "It was the moment for the chloroformed handkerchief," in their words.

The summary of the police report goes on to say that the car, accompanied by a red taxi, drove along the Rouen highway until it reached a confluent of the Seine, where a boat was in waiting. The report also contains the statements of reputable witnesses—market men—who allege they saw the car accompanied by the red taxi in Normandy and shipbuilders and fishermen who have testified to seeing a mysterious steamer of about 5,000 tons lying off that coast on Jan. 26.

Says Body Was Buried Near Paris.

Burtsef writes: They wanted to take him alive, but only obtained a corpse. General Koutiepoff received an overdose of chloroform or other anesthetic by the OGPU agents and succumbed while he was in the motor car. When it was discovered that General Koutiepoff was dead his body was naturally taken in the car to a secluded part of the road and buried near it, possibly not far from Paris."

On being interrogated by the Sûreté as to the source of his information Burtsef declined to give it, but declared that he would soon be in a position to give complete details of the crime and would publish them in La Cause Commune. He stated, however, in answer to inquiries, that the agents who carried out the abduction were shot on their return to Russia, partly as a punishment for their clumsiness in killing General Koutiepoff too soon and partly to insure their silence. Burtsef also contends that Ianovitch, alias Viliansky, who had formerly been the OGPU chief at Istanbul and Prague, was still residing in the embassy in the Rue de Grenelle.

Both the Sûreté and the press show a disposition to credit Burtsef with authentic information—they acknowledge his being a skilled investigator, republish his record and declare that he has always been found to be a man of his word. Most of the newspapers admit that his statement disposes of the last part of the police theory—that the victim had been carried off by sea, which all along had been difficult to believe.

One paper emphasizes the fact that to make the time of the abduction in Paris fit with the times at which the alleged Bolshevist cars were seen near the Norman coast the drivers would have had to go at very high speeds—which would have been impossible when considering the known traffic blocks in Paris; yet no such cars were noticed at Mantes and Evreux on the available main road or at Rouen and Honfleur on the indirect road from Paris to the coast, although there were right-angled turns in each town and policemen always stationed there, particularly on Sundays, on one of which Jan. 26 fell. Any other route, it is added, would have led along by-roads on which the postulated speed would have been impossible.

Mysterious Ship Discounted.

At the point where the police conclusion deduces General Koutiepoff was put on board ship—that is between Houlgate and Villers—investigators have discovered that the nature of the coast would have made the embarkation prohibitive, and that as to the mysterious steamer seen by fishermen and shipbuilders on Jan. 26, such ships often, for various reasons, lie off the coast.

Even before M. Burtsef made public his explanation, so impossible had the embarkation theory been shown to be that some papers had advanced the theory that persons who knew the suburbs of Paris well had prepared a place not far away—some secluded villa possibly—where the General was done to death, while the motor cars were sent in various directions, as if containing him, with the object of laying false trails. This explanation was supported by the testimony of widely separated witnesses, who had seen similar pairs of cars at the same time.

NEW SUBMARINE TRIED; CALLED SAFEST BUILT

V-5 Has Safeguards Against Chlorine Gas Poisoning, Escape Hatches and Other New Devices.

The submarine V-5, which made a trial trip at Provincetown, Me., on Wednesday, is the safest submersible launched, according to a statement issued by the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company yesterday. The submarine made seventeen knots on the trip. It will receive its final trials late in the Fall. After the trials, the V-5 will join Pacific Submarine Division 20 at San Diego, Cal. It is in command of Lieut. Commander John H. Brown, U. S. N.

The storage batteries of the craft are housed in a special compartment, so ventilated that no gases may escape into the vessel. In many submarine accidents, the influx of salt water into the batteries has generated chlorine gas and poisoned the crew. Other safety devices are "lungs" for every member of the crew. These enable them to breathe while rising from the submarine to the surface after any accident which may cause them to remain involuntarily submerged.

The V-5 has three escape hatches, one through the conning tower and the others forward and aft of the torpedo room. They are so arranged that the entire crew may escape. Each hatch is built with a series of compartments or escape locks. In case of emergency, groups of the crew enter the locks with safety "lungs." The lock is flooded and they open the outside door and escape. Then the water is pumped from the compartment and the process is repeated until all are out.

For deep sea diving and long underwater cruising, air-salvaging machinery has been installed, together with an elaborate ventilating system to insure pure air at all times.

In the control room are an automatic steering gear and a bank of valves that control all machinery on the ship. Between each bulkhead there is a complete set of automatic and manual controls that permit the vessel to be manoeuvred from a number of places in cases of emergency. These controls also regulate the ventilating system, the diving and rising machinery and also the communication system, which is elaborate.

The propelling, flooding, ventilating, drainage and other machinery, together with the hydraulic steering gear controls, ammunition hoist and lighting sets were furnished by the Westinghouse organization. The V-5 is unusually roomy. The craft is 371 feet long, 33 feet beam and has a draft of 16 feet. The crew includes seven officers and eighty enlisted men.

TARDIEU URGES NEED OF INTERNATIONALISM

Tells War Veterans From Both Sides World Must Realize Interests Are Linked.

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 26.—To a delegation of 150 former soldiers from ten different countries who were engaged in the World War on both sides and who are holding a conference in Paris, Premier Tardieu today delivered a little homily on the world's need for thinking and acting internationally.

"In all your countries, in every country just now," he said, "there is a tendency to build up barriers of all kinds, not only against other countries, but by one group against another group and by one interest against another interest. We are all being compartmentalized and we have not yet learned that it is a mistake and that one day we shall find we cannot accomplish anything, because we have all been so barred off from each other.

"What is needed by the world above all other things, just now, is such contacts as yours, such efforts at better understanding and such realization that each one's interest is tied up with the interests of all."

M. Tardieu left for Nancy tonight and will deliver a political speech there tomorrow.

SEA TRIP FOR TINY BLIMP.

Brinkman Arrives Here to Speed Trans-Ocean Flight Plans.

Otto Brinkman, president of the Ski Ad Company, 1 Broadway, who recently announced the projected flying of a 240-foot blimp from Germany to New York, returned yesterday on the Hamburg-American liner New York and said that construction of the dirigible would be completed some time in September and that he expected the flight to start a few weeks later.

The blimp, which is being built by August Riedinger Balloon Manufacturing Company in Augsberg, Germany, will be fifty-five feet in diameter and have an enclosed space of 175,000 cubic feet, with room to transport twenty-four persons, including the crew. Three 220 horsepower Maybach motors will provide propulsion. It will carry only five persons on the Atlantic crossing now planned.

He said the purpose of bringing the ship here is primarily to convert it into an advertising medium by installation of two large frames holding an electric automatic sign system.

Also on the New York were a group of German and French motion picture actors and actresses.

GAINS IN NICARAGUA LAID TO MARINES' AID

Collector General's Report of Conditions for 1929 Reveals Era of Prosperity.

FULL COFFEE CROP SAVED

Banditry Reduced, Public Debt Being Paid, Highways Extended and Building Booming, He Says.

An encouraging picture of conditions in Nicaragua is drawn in the annual report for 1929 of Irving A. Lindberg, Collector General and High Commissioner of that country, advance proofs of which were received in New York last week. According to Mr. Lindberg, the republic is paying off steadily its bonded debt, now reduced to small proportions; it is enjoying political stability and good order; highways are being repaired and extended, and commercial conditions are prosperous enough so that Managua, the capital, is enjoying a building boom.

Mr. Lindberg gives credit to the United States Marines, who still remain in reduced numbers in the country, and the Nicaraguan National Guard for reducing banditry so effectually that Nicaragua's entire coffee crop, its chief source of wealth, has been harvested without loss to a single owner. Formerly bandits exacted a costly tribute annually from the coffee growers.

Nevertheless, the Collector General does not believe that banditry can be stamped out within any reasonable time.

"That will only be accomplished," he says in his report, "with the opening up of the country by good roads and the general advance of civilization. All that can be expected is that the outlaw groups will be whittled down and isolated to a point where, considering the condition of the people, educational, economic and political, life and property may be said to enjoy reasonable security. This is the function of the Guardia Nacional, and is not a problem for the marine forces in Nicaragua.

"The Marine Brigade, committed to a policy which provided for the establishing and the training of a Nicaraguan force for the preservation of peace and good order within the limits of the country, has cooperated in every way with the accomplishment of this mission and it is now felt that the Guardia Nacional is ready to take over these important duties. However, to properly support the Guardia Nacional it is felt that a greatly reduced Marine force at certain key points in the Ocotal and in the Matagalpa-Jinotega district, with aviation at its present strength and a strong garrison at Managua to act as a support and example for the Guardia, will be necessary for several more months."

Mr. Lindberg pays a high compliment to the national guard as built up by Colonel R. Y. Rhea and Lieut. Col. Elias R. Beadle and as commanded by General D. C. McDougal. These are officers of the United States Marine Corps, who have served in turn as commander of the Nicaraguan National Guard under Nicaraguan commissions.

"The organization of the National Guard has been a particularly difficult problem, especially on account of the activities of roving groups of bandits in the northern area," says Mr. Lindberg. "These bandits are being steadily eliminated and it is only a question of time when they will no longer be a problem."

Recruiting for the guard has been successful and young men of a high standard have been obtained according to Mr. Lindberg.

Compliments Work of Marines.

The report also pays a compliment to the work of the marines, first under Brig. Gen. Logan Feland and now under Brig. Gen. Dion Williams, in restoring order after the damaging campaigns of Augusto C. Sandino.

The Collector General brings out an interesting phase of the marine occupation, which has been drastically reduced, in reporting that the withdrawal of so large a part of the force has measurably decreased the amount of money in circulation. During 1927 and 1928, when the American occupational force was 5,000 men, the marines spent about $250,000 a month in Nicaragua.

Of economic conditions Mr. Lindberg writes:

"The past year has been an excellent one for the Republic of Nicaragua. The foreign commerce, although the coffee crop was below the average, was good. The government has done everything possible to open up new highways and keep the old ones in repair. Several government building projects were initiated which gave employment to many. The finances of the country are in excellent condition, and the government railroad, bank and wharves are yielding substantial profits, the excess being used for public improvements.

"The bonded indebtedness is small, and the interest and amortization are promptly paid.

"The striking feature of the past year has been the great increase in production and exportation of agricultural products. Nicaragua is primarily an agricultural country and efforts should be made to increase the production.

"The conditions of health and sanitation have steadily improved due to the years of labor on the part of the Rockefeller Institute and the activity of the United States naval doctors associated with the marines.

"Economic conditions for the year 1930 will not be as good as the past year. Revenues of the Republic will fall as the purchasing power of the country will be less than 1929, due to the low price of coffee and a small crop. A large coffee crop was expected, but climatic conditions, and high labor costs curtailed production. The withdrawal of practically all of the marines will also be keenly felt, as the expenditures of this organization did much to help the economic situation of the country during the past three years."

Bonded Debt Being Reduced.

Nicaragua's national debt, on paper, is $22,470,374, as of March 31, 1930, the report points out. Of this amount, however, $18,000,000 is made up of claims against the government for damages sustained in recent revolutions or by the activity of bandits. Most of these claims are brought by Nicaraguans. American citizens, however, have brought eighty claims totaling $2,473,914; British citizens ask $280,326 and Italians $167,118.

ARABS ASK LEAGUE TO ANNUL MANDATE

'Say Balfour Declaration on Palestine Conflicts With Promises to Them.

THEY SUBMIT DOCUMENTS

Insist Independence Pledges Made to King Hussein in 1915 Included Palestine.

By CLARENCE K. STREIT.
Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, July 17.—On the basis of a statement purporting to have been made by Lord Balfour in 1918 to King Hussein, the Syro-Palestine delegation of Arabs is asking the League of Nations to nullify the Palestine mandate. In support of their contention they have sent to the League a photographic copy of the Arabic original of this statement, with a French translation of it and a letter setting forth their claims.

Their argument, as has already been reported, is, briefly, that Lord Balfour, after making in 1917 the famous declaration in favor of a Jewish national home in Palestine on which the mandate is based, reiterated in his 1918 statement to King Hussein the promises of Arab independence made to him in the MacMahon-Hussein correspondence of 1915. Since, according to the Arabs, these promises included Palestine, they hold that the Balfour declaration to the Jews is nullified by the contradictory promises made both before and after it to the Arabs.

The question remains whether the British, in the MacMahon-Hussein correspondence, did include Palestine in their promises to the Arabs, as the latter claim. The British have officially stated that they made a reservation for Palestine, but they have always refused to publish the text of the correspondence, around which the present Arab move makes the controversy centre more than ever.

The League has not yet officially published the Arab note or the statement attached to it. An unofficial translation of the French text of the document the Arabs have submitted follows:

Balfour Document Text.

Jedda, Feb. 8, 1918.

To his Majesty the King of the Hedjaz, Sherif and Emir of Mecca:

I have received the order of his Lordship the Viceroy to communicate to your Majesty the dispatch sent by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at London addressed to your Majesty by the Government of his Brittanic Majesty, the text of which follows:

"The perfect sincerity and zeal of which your Majesty has given proof in sending to his Lordship the Viceroy the letter of the Turkish commandant, addressed to his Highness the Emir Feisal and to [illegible]affar Pasha, have made the best impression on the government of his Brittanic Majesty, and the assurances that your Majesty has taken on this occasion are but proof of the friendship and sincerity which have always characterized the relations between the Hedjaz Government and the government of his Majesty the King of Great Britain.

"It is certain that the policy followed by Turkey tends to arouse suspicion and doubt between the allied Powers and the Arabs, who, under the high command and direction of your Majesty, have made admirable efforts to recover their former liberty.

"The Turkish policy does not cease to sow these doubts, to suggest to the Arabs that the allied Powers have an eye on their territories and to make the Allies believe that the Arabs can be swerved from their determination.

"The efforts of the intriguers, however, will not succeed in sowing discord among those whose spirit is directed toward a single idea and a single goal.

"The government of his Brittanic Majesty, in accord with its allies, persists in its favorable attitude toward any movement having for its object the liberation of oppressed nations, and it is determined to support the Arab nations in their struggle to reconstruct an Arab empire in which the Sheri, the 'Moslem Law,' will dominate in place of Turkish injustice and in which the artificial discord among the Arabs, roused by the official Turkish authorities, will disappear.

"The government of his Brittanic Majesty reiterates its preceding promises concerning the liberation of the Arab nations.

"Having undertaken this policy of liberation, it is determined to persevere on this road with loyalty and with the resolution to prevent the Arabs who are already liberated from falling back into the abyss of servitude and to help those who are still under the yoke to obtain their liberation."

May your Majesty deign to accept my respectful homage.

The representative of Great Britain at Jedda,

COLONEL PABST.

Translation of Arab Letter.

The Arab letter, submitting the above document, follows, translated unofficially from the French:

Geneva, July 11, 1930.

To his Excellency, Sir Eric Drummond, Secretary General of the League of Nations, Geneva.

Excellency:

We have the honor of sending you herewith the textual translation as well as the copy of the letter addressed, in the name of the Government of his Britannic Majesty, by Lord Balfour, then Minister for Foreign Affairs, to his Majesty King Hussein, dated Feb. 8, 1918.

This text shows:

1. That the British Government has solemnly recognized the admirable efforts of the Arabs, under the command and direction of his Majesty King Hussein, to reconquer their former liberty.

2. That it was decided "to persist, in accord with its allies, in the policy of liberation of oppressed peoples";

3. "to support the Arab nations in their struggle to reconstruct an Arab Empire in which the law and the Sheri [the Moslem legislation] will dominate."

4. That, to make more precise these formal assurances, the British Government judged it necessary "to confirm, in this important document, its preceding promises, made in 1915, concerning the liberation of the Arab nations."

These promises are contained, as is known, in eight letters exchanged between King Hussein and Sir Henry MacMahon. They were published for the first time, in the form of a resumé, by the newspaper, Le Temps, on Sept. 17, 1919, and recently by the review, La Nation Arabe, organ of the Syro-Palestinian Delegation, in the June number.

We consider that Your Excellency cannot ignore the importance of this document concerning the act of alliance and friendship between two allies.

We would not have addressed ourselves to Your Excellency if we did not know that the principal mandate, the one relating to Palestine—which is far from having the least connection with the Covenant of the League of Nations, since it is contrary, both in spirit and in letter, to its Article XXII—is based solely and exclusively on the Balfour promise, proclaimed in the name of the British Government.

We thus have two promises, equally precise and clear, but contradictory.

We are not concerned at this time with the fact that the first of these promises has for its object the imposition on the inhabitants of Palestine of a people that is foreign to them and who come to evict and subjugate them. We wish to call attention to the fact, solely from the viewpoint of international law.

We have shown that the only basis of the Palestine mandate is the Balfour promise made to the Jews in 1917, that is to say, two years after the obligations which Great Britain and its allies had contracted vis-à-vis with the Arabs. This promise, from the standpoint of international law, could not invalidate the above obligations and should be considered as null and void. But since its execution has been undertaken, despite the promisees of 1915, it will remain in vigor as long as it is not abrogated and annulled by an act based on a later obligation. That is why we consider that the Balfour declaration of Nov. 2, 1917, should be considered as null and void by the allies and associates as soon as they have cognizance of the second Balfour promise of Feb. 8, 1918, made to the Arabs in accord with the allies in the name of the same British Government and of the same Minister, and in which the previous obligations of 1915 were solemnly confirmed, thus annulling the effect of the first declaration.

Six Considerations Given.

In consequence of these observations and considering:

1. That the obligations that, in addressing ourselves to your Excellency, we have just made public and exposed solemnly before the civilized world, are of a nature to shake the very base of the mandate over the Arab countries and particularly the one for Palestine;

2. That it would not be compatible with the prestige of the League of Nations to maintain a measure whose validity is gone and which has become, by the publication of this authentic document, null and without force;

3. That the Allies and associates, who form the majority of the Honorable Council of the League of Nations, cannot overlook the obligations contracted in their name, and that the neutrals, and especially the other belligerents, who had no part in the creation and distribution of the mandates, have no more plausible reasons than the Allies to oppose the abolition of a state of affairs based on the negation of law;

4. That the Mandates Commission has always abstained from discussing the question of the juridical and international basis of the mandates;

5. That the Council and the Assembly of the League of Nations are alone qualified to appreciate and judge this question between two Allies, one of which is a member of the international areopagus;

6. That the essential duty of the League of Nations is to make justice reign and to respect scrupulously all obligations in the mutual relations of organized peoples;

We take the liberty of requesting you, in your rôle of Secretary General of the League of Nations, to submit this note, together with the enclosed photograph, which we have the honor of sending you in the name of the peoples of Syria and Palestine, directly to the Honorable Council and the Assembly of the League of Nations for examination and for the execution of their stipulations.

Please accept, Excellency, our highest consideration.

Members of the Syro-Palestinian delegation:
EMIR SHEKIB ARSLAN (absent),
IHSAN EL JABRI,
RIAD EL SOLH (absent).

The Secretariat has not yet decided what disposition to make of this petition, but it is doubtful that it will be submitted by it to any one save the Mandates Commission. Any League member can, however, bring it before the Council or Assembly on its own responsibility. The only Moslem League State, Persia, is at present a member of the Council.

$75,000,000 Spent by 800,000 Visitors Here At 1,001 Conventions in Year Ended April 30

In the year ended on April 30, 1930, New York City was the scene of 1,001 conventions and trade expositions which brought 800,000 visitors here, according to a report made public yesterday by the Merchants' Association. The visitors stayed an average of four and one-half days and spent $75,000,000 in stores, hotels, restaurants, theatres and other local enterprises, according to the association's estimate.

Moreover, the report says, "in addition to their personal expenditures, thousands of these visitors bought goods from manufacturers, wholesalers and distributors, opened new accounts and formed new commercial and financial connections, the aggregate value of which is literally incalculable." The number of conventions and expositions here was eight less than in the preceding year, which set a record.

"New York has to face vigorous competition from every one of the cities whose population exceeds 100,000 throughout the United States," the report says, "for every one of them carries on an active effort to land conventions, as is also done by some hundreds of Summer and Winter resorts.

"Then, too, New York is not favored by geography. Many of its rivals in the convention field build largely upon their accessibility. Our myriad attractions and diversions, constituting as they do a powerful magnet to visitors, are alleged by its competitors to furnish an argument against its selection as a meeting place—an argument which has no basis in fact." The statement declared the activities of the association were responsible for an increase over the number of conventions formerly held here.

January was the month of the greatest number of meetings, with 174. The lowest number, eighteen, fell in August.

PARIS, July 26.—Every one who travels, reads, listens, eats, drinks or has a liver knows at least something about Vichy. Its fame is more than 2,000 years old. Caesar passed near its site, which the Romans named "Town of Warm Waters" (Vicus Aquae Calidae), and here they built famous thermae, uncovered about a century ago.

In the Middle Ages monks knew the healing properties of these springs. Under Henry IV its prosperity revived.

The house is still shown where Mme. de Sevigne came after a seven days' trip from Paris in a carriage drawn by six horses in the year 1677 and had a villa known as the hostelry Sevigne Vichy, where she took annually the treatment for rheumatism. She write in her letters: "At 6 in the morning you go to the spring. Every one is there and every one drinks and makes a wry face, for the waters are boiling hot and the saltpeter tastes very bitter."

Today Vichy, at the height of the season, is the most animated thermal resort in Europe, what with the casino, the opera which draws for its brilliant audiences from both hemispheres, the horse races, the renowned golf course, tennis, swimming pool, regattas and clubs, all to amuse the throngs after drinking and bathing in the celebrated waters. The entire thermal region of Auvergne, with cures for every known disease, has become in recent years a great cure centre for Americans.

Vichy is a good point of departure for all these thermal centres. Montdore has more American clients each year for the asthma and hay fever cure, while Royat has principally patients for heart cure. Other centres with famous waters are Saint Nectaire, especially for rheumatism, and Labourboule, whose waters have more arsenic than any others and are used as a cure for bronchitis, especially in children.

Americans taking the latter cure include the Comtesse de Jumilhac, formerly Mrs. Lanyear Norrie, née Estelle Barkey, of New York. Among the American patients at Vichy is Bernard Baruch, who for several years had hopes of making Saratoga Springs a thermal centre fashioned after Vichy. Mortimer Schiff is taking the cure while attending the races, having horses entered. Mrs. Virginia Fair Vanderbilt just completed a cure, as did Mr. and Mrs. George Blumenthal.

Mrs. John A. Logan is now at Vichy after having as her guest at her Paris home her daughter, Lady Maxwell Scott, whose husband is a descendant of Sir Walter Scott and the inherited famous Abbotsford. Lady Scott, formerly Marie Louise Logan, who first married Henri de Sincay, is convalescing after an appendicitis operation and is now returning to her home in Scotland. Mrs. Armcotts Wilson, the former Mrs. E. Clarence Jones of New York, is seen daily on the Vichy golf course.

Well-known Americans taking the Montdore cure include John D. Little, who is returning to Paris for a few days and then is going with his wife to the German spa, Bad Nauheim, and later to Carlsbad; also Mr. and Mrs. John K. Wallace.

STANDARD TYPE VAN FOR PRISONERS URGED

Official of National Group, in Magazine Article, Advocates Conference Here.

E. Stagg Whitin, chairman of the executive council of the National Committee on Prisons and Prison Labor, urges that a conference be called to consider what is the best type of prison van, in an article appearing in the August number of The Panel, official organ of the Association of Grand Jurors of New York County.

"Seventy thousand prisoners, according to a very conservative estimate," he writes, "are annually transported to and from courts and prisons in the five counties which comprise Greater New York. In no two counties are they transported by the same method." He goes on to say that the transportation of prisoners is divided between the Sheriff and the Commissioner of Correction.

"The French plan of a separate compartment in the van for each prisoner is worthy of consideration," he declares. "A canvass of a number of the companies which construct prison vans showed a willingness to cooperate in the development of something better," he continues. "New construction materials should be studied, including bullet-proof steel and opaque bullet-proof glass. Systems of heating and ventilating should be considered, and the possibility of special compartments for the less vicious prisoners, where they can be safe and need not be handcuffed."

DEFENDS GRAND JURY CRITICIZED BY COURT

Foreman Says Body That Indicted Jersey Prosecutor Was Hampered by County Officials.

TOMS RIVER, N. J., July 26.—William H. Fischer, publisher, who was foreman of the grand jury which was criticized severely and discharged yesterday by Supreme Court Justice Joseph L. Bodine following the acquittal of Prosecutor James Mercer Davis, whom it had indicted, issued a stateemnt about the matter today.

The statement was directed principally at the Board of Freeholders of the county, who urged dismissal of the grand jury as a matter of economy. In discharging the grand jury Justice Bodine remarked that it had carried on an expensive investigation and returned with "a trifling charge," which was not sustained by evidence.

To show the great interest of the grand jurors in the financial affairs of the county, Mr. Fisher said the twenty-three grand jurors owned property with an assessed total valuation of $3,000,000, while the three freeholders' assessed wealth is $20,000. He pointed out that the grand jury included in its membership a bank president, a bank manager, the head of the biggest building and loan association in the county, the manager of the biggest Lakewood hotel and the owner of the biggest mercantile establishment in the county, as well as the publishers of three newspapers in the county.

"We have nothing to vindicate," he declared. "Our position is best represented by the calibre of our membership. The grand jury has done its best, though hampered by the officials of the county."

ADVISES SELLING WHEAT.

French Cabinet Tells Farmers to Accept Present High Prices.

PARIS, July 26 (AP).—The Cabinet today approved a plan of the Minister of Agriculture to advise French farmers to sell wheat at present high prices and also took measures to reduce the cost of living.

The percentage of foreign wheat that may be used in flour was increased from 3 to 10 and a general investigation of middlemen's profits was ordered.

Wheat sold yesterday in the Paris market at 160 francs a quintal of 220 pounds, which is the equivalent of $1.71 a bushel. Wheat sold at two-thirds of that price two months ago, according to Deputy Léon Meyer, Mayor of Havre, who had been protesting publicly against the rising cost of living. M. Meyer informed Premier Tardieu that he intended to take the matter into Parliament when that body reassembled.

Minister of Commerce Etienne Flandin, it was announced today, has ordered a study of the prices of flour and other necessities throughout France and will seek measures to reduce middlemen's expenses.

AUTO CLUB PROTESTS FINES

Objects to Strictness of Authorities in Budd Lake, N. J.

Special to The New York Times.

DOVER, N. J., July 26.—The Morris County Automobile Club has taken up the complaint of several of its members alleging unwarranted use of magisterial powers by Chief of Police Daniel Tremitier and Recorder Alan Knowles at Budd Lake and has requested the Mount Olive Township Committee to investigate.

Daniel P. Beebe, secretary, charges that Recorder Knowles imposed exorbitant fines and court costs upon persons arrested in the township for minor infractions of the motor vehicle law.

After a fatal accident on July 12 at Budd Lake, the Mount Olive Township Committee and police department of Budd Lake decided to enforce strictly the law forbidding motorists to overtake at road intersections and on curves. Of several persons arrested on July 16, four were found guilty and fined $10 and costs. On July 18, Chief Tremetier and two officers made nineteen arrests and fines were imposed up to $5 and costs.

Recorder Knowles holds that he is privileged under the motor vehicle law to charge $3 costs in each case.

The committee has promised to take up the matter and adjust the difficulty.

CLOSE FIGHT LOOMS AT CANADA'S POLLS

By J. A. McNEIL.

exports to that country and increase the already unfavorable balance of trade against the Dominion.

Paradox in Rival Tariff Stands

It was in an endeavor to combat the situation thus created that the Dunning budget was presented to Parliament in May, with its countervailing duties against a number of American commodities and an increase in the preference granted to many items of import which are produced in Britain or the other dominions and colonies of the Empire.

Naturally, unanimity of agreement upon the merits and the ultimate effects of such a tariff measure was not to be expected of the rival parliamentarians, but the lines upon which the two parties lined up in the budget debate, and subsequently on the hustings, were amusingly paradoxical.

The Prime Minister and the leading members of his Cabinet, long accused (and not without some show of reason) of being pro-American and somewhat lukewarm toward Great Britain and the empire, are proclaiming themselves ardent imperialists, while the Conservatives, traditionally ultra-British, are subscribing heartily to Mr. Bennett's dictum that Canadian dollars spent in London or the West Indies are of no more benefit to workless Canadian citizens than money sent to enrich the United States.

Range of Conservative Appeal.

The latter argument, supplemented by Mr. Bennett's promises of unemployment relief and higher protection for Canadian manufactures and agriculture, undoubtedly has a potent appeal to many members of the electorate, including the farmers whose wheat is unsold and whose dairying has been ruined by subsidized New Zealand butter and a prohibitive United States tariff; the workers out of a job or on short time; the manufacturers who see their home market flooded with imported goods; the merchants whose profits have dwindled—in short, the classes who in the aggregate represent by far the larger proportion of the total vote.

All through the ranks of the general level of the electorate, those who can be swayed by party catch-words and political chaff, many, if not most, are telling themselves and each other that any change of government would be for the better.

On the other hand, the thinking few, while realizing that no specific act by either party could have averted or can decisively remedy the existing situation, believe that the advent of a new administration would have a marked psychological effect in that with every one hoping for and expecting an immediate improvement, the resultant state of the public mind would help to bring about the much-desired start back toward prosperity.

Party Records on the Tariff.

Added to this is the fact that the Conservative party and its leaders have been unwavering in advocacy of the protectionist principle for more than fifty years, while the Liberals, though practicing protection when in power, have in theory, at least, been free traders, a pose sedulously maintained of late years in order to win and hold the agrarians of the Prairie Provinces whose ideal it is to sell all they produce at the highest possible prices while buying all the goods they consume at the lowest irrespective of whether these are made in Canada or abroad.

Thus, though the Liberals' tariffs have, with minor exceptions, done no particular harm to Canadian industry, their professed fiscal policies have kept capitalists and industrialists on tenterhooks at times, as compared with the sense of stability and certainty which imbues manufacturing and trade circles when the Conservatives hold the reins of government.

Political Swing of Provinces.

Two important factors, one known and one unknown, will play a leading part in the voting of Monday and the subsequent developments.

The known factor is the political complexion of the various Provinces, as reflected in the nine Provincial Parliaments and the men who control them. Canada is obviously nearing the end of the fourth of a series of cycles which have been noted in the country's political history since confederation was achieved in 1867.

With one of the two old-line parties holding power at Ottawa, the Provinces, one by one, change their allegiance to that party and install administrations of the opposite political faith, or of the Progressive persuasion, since that movement assumed form twelve years ago. When all, or nearly all, have lined up in opposition to the powers at Ottawa, the government there is turned out.

The victors are no sooner securely seated in the national capital than disintegration begins to affect their followers throughout the Provinces, and in ten or fifteen years the pendulum has swung over, the Provinces are arrayed against the dominant party in the Dominion Parliament, and there is a change of the national government. Then the process is reversed again.

This was what happened when Laurier led the Liberals to victory in 1896, when Borden headed the Conservatives in ousting Laurier in 1911, and when Mackenzie King turned out the wartime Conservative Government in 1921.

Indications of Cycle Ending.

Today the cycle is almost completed. In 1921 every Province except New Brunswick had a Liberal or a Progressive Government. Today only Quebec and Prince Edward Island, the latter the smallest of the Provinces, remain in the Liberal fold. In four Provincial elections held within the past six months the Conservatives retained power in Ontario and New Brunswick, and defeated the Liberals in Saskatchewan, while in Alberta the Farmer party maintained its hold. British Columbia went Conservative two years ago, and Manitoba has a Progressive Administration.

In the light of history, events are shaping themselves for a change at Ottawa.

The Conservative Premiers of Ontario, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, incensed at Mr. King's rather tactless proclamation in Parliament that he "would not give a five-cent piece to any Tory Province" for unemployment relief, have thrown themselves vigorously into the fight against the Liberals, and as each is a popular and able politician their efforts will have a measurable effect.

Premier Taschereau of Quebec, on the contrary, has done little for his party friends at Ottawa, confining his efforts to addressing two or three meetings near Quebec City. The Progressive Premiers of Manitoba and Alberta have held aloof.

Uncertainty of Progressive Factor.

The unknown quantity in the campaign is the Progressive faction, composed largely of Western agrarians.

Mr. King took office in 1921 by virtue of more Liberals than Conservatives being elected, 117 to 50, but the Progressives, then at the height of their political fortunes, had 65 members, and Mr. King picked a majority over a possible combination of Conservatives, Progressives and a scattering of independents.

The Progressives thus held the balance of power from 1921 to 1925, and again in the short-lived Fifteenth Parliament of 1925-26, but they proved amenable to the blandishments of the Liberals and time after time saved the government from defeat in the Commons.

Meanwhile, the Progressive movement, disturbed by internal dissension, has declined in strength, while some of its members are no longer the tacit allies of the Liberals. In fact, for the first time, the two parties are actively opposed in many of the Western ridings, including several where Liberal Ministers are endangered by Progressive opponents, who, though quite unlikely of election, will divert enough votes to give the Conservtive candidates a good chance of success.

Chance for Progressive Key Bloc.

Progressive sentiment is still strong enough on the prairies to send a delegation of twenty or more to Ottawa, and while the outlook is that the Conservatives will outnumber the Liberals when the returns are in, it is possible that the margin will be so narrow that the Progressives will again hold the balance.

This would place Mr. Bennett in the same uneasy position that Mr. King occupied from 1921 to 1926, and that Ramsay MacDonald has filled in both his terms of office in England.

Conservative pride is not likely to lend itself to the bargaining tactics by which Mr. King kept his hold on office for the first six years of the present decade, and a stalemate would be almost certainly followed by another election within a year.

Trends in the Provinces.

Taking the Provinces individually in rapid survey from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the chances of the respective parties would seem to be somewhat as follows:

Nova Scotia's Provincial Government is Conservative by a narrow majority, but its liquor control policy was emphatically endorsed last year and it recently won an important by-election. The Province sent eleven Conservatives to Ottawa in 1926, against three Liberals, and this standing should be approximately maintained.

New Brunswick's Conservative Premier regained power a few months ago with a reduced but still adequate majority, and the Dominion representation of seven Conservatives to four Liberals may reasonably be expected to hold good.

Prince Edward Island is negligible, sending but four members to Ottawa in a total of 245, of whom one was a Conservative in the last House.

Quebec's Devotion to the Past.

Quebec's "bloc" of sixty Liberals in the Commons out of the Province's quota of sixty-five owes its persistence to the devotion to the memory of Laurier and bitter resentment against conscription in wartime. Now a new generation that knows not Joseph is coming to the polls.

French-Canadian orators have sought to call the spirits of Laurier and the conscription bogy from the vasty deep, but will they come? Basically, the people of Quebec are protectionist in sentiment, for that way lies the welfare of their large industrial and agricultural interests.

There has been a remarkable recrudescence of Conservative enthusiasm in Quebec, but the stumbling block in the party's path is that forty or more seats have been held by Liberal majorities of 2,000 to 13,000, and such long leads are not easily overtaken. The Conservatives' optimistic chief organizer claims twelve ridings, but his party will do well if they double their little band of four in the last Parliament.

Ontario offers more encouragement. Premier Ferguson won a sweeping victory there a few months ago, getting the largest majority ever accorded a Provincial Premier. The Conservatives sent fifty-three members to Ottawa in 1926, as against twenty-five Liberals, but they have had as high as seventy-two in a previous Parliament, and have good prospects of splitting the difference and taking ten to twelve ridings from the Liberals, while losing two or three of their former holdings. Ontario elected two Progressives in 1926, with none from the other Eastern Provinces.

Internal Shifts in the West.

Manitoba has a Progressive government, but in Dominion affairs that party is weaking. Though no Conservatives were elected in that Province in 1926, the party polled two-fifths of the total vote, and with three-corner contests in eight of the seventeen seats, the Conservatives should take three to five of them.

Saskatchewan has just turned out a Liberal government in favor of a Conservative-Progressive coalition, another significant indication of the definite split of the former Liberal-Farmer alliance, and, aided by civil war in the Liberal camp, three or four Conservatives should go to Ottawa, where none went in 1926.

Alberta's Progressive government was returned in full strength earlier in the year, and Conservative chances are slight there except in the cities of Calgary and Edmonton where, as in the majority of Canadian cities except in Quebec, industrial sentiment should favor the party of protection.

British Columbia had twelve Conservatives out of fourteen members in the last House, and there are no indications that this proportion will be materially changed.

The Yukon territory elects one member, generally a Conservative.

Major Influences in the Election.

To sum up, the influences which should operate to give the Conservatives a preponderance of members over the Liberals, with only a distant possibility of a clear majority over a combined opposition of Liberals and the independent groups, are:

General depression and serious unemployment.

Loss of strength by the Progressive faction and the widening of the breach between that group and their former Liberal allies.

Effective aid to Mr. Bennett's cause by Conservative Provincial Premiers, who head five of Canada's nine Provinces.

A possible, but not probable, loosening of Quebec's bond to unquestioning adherence to the Liberal faith.

Striking an average between the boasts of the respective parties on the eve of polling, the result after polling will probably be found to vary but slightly one way or the other from these figures: Conservatives, 115; Liberals, 100; Progressives, Independents, Labor, &c., 30.

F. K. PENDLETON, EX-JUSTICE, DIES

He Succumbs to Illness Resulting From Shock Received in Automobile Accident.

WAS GRANDSON OF F. S. KEY

His Other Grandfather Was Second to Alexander Hamilton in Duel With Aaron Burr.

Francis Key Pendleton, former Justice of the New York State Supreme Court, died early yesterday morning at his home at 7 East Eighty-sixth Street after an illness resulting from a severe shock which he suffered two months ago in an automobile accident on Riverside Drive.

Mr. Pendleton was a member of an old Virginia family. He was a grandson of Francis Scott Key, author of the "Star-Spangled Banner," and a grandson of Nathaniel Pendleton, who was Alexander Hamilton's second in the duel with Aaron Burr. His father, George H. Pendleton, was a United States Senator from Ohio, Minister to Germany and a candidate for Vice President.

Mr. Pendleton was educated at Harvard, where he was a classmate of the late Senator Henry Cabot Lodge and of August and Perry Belmont. He received a degree of A. B. in 1870 and a LL. B. degree in 1875. After graduation he traveled abroad for two years.

In 1873 he entered the law office here of Carter & Eaton, but later entered partnership with Samuel L. Parrish. Eventually he became a member of the firm of Pendleton, Anderson, Iselin & Riggs. He practiced law for many years before taking any part in public life. In 1905 he became chairman of Mayor McClellan's City Beautiful Committee. Two years later he became Corporation Counsel, which post he held for three years.

In 1911 he was appointed by Governor Dix to justiceship in the Supreme Court, to complete the term of Supreme Court Justice Edward B. Whitney, who had died. Later he ran for the office and was elected to a term expiring in 1921, but resigned in 1920.

He never sought publicity, and according to Gorge Pendleton, his son, was particularly averse to public mention of his age.

He was a director of the Guardian Life Insurance Company of America, the New York Coal Company, the Low Volatile Coal Company and the New York Title and Mortgage Company. He was acting president general of the Society of the Cincinnati and a member of Delta Kappa Epsilon. His clubs included the Union, Knickerbocker, Metropolitan, Manhattan, National Democratic, Turf and Field, Meadow Brook and Piping Rock. He is survived by his widow, the former Elizabeth La Montagne of New York, and his son, both of whom were with him when he died.

Funeral services will take place Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock at St. Thomas's Church, Fifth Avenue and Fifty-third Street. Burial will be private.

Mrs. Ellen Kean Sharp.

Mrs. Ellen Kean Sharp, widow of James A. Sharp and a sister of the late Mgr. John J. Kean, died yesterday at her home, 630 Third Street, Brooklyn. She was in her seventy-ninth year. The funeral will be held on Tuesday morning, with a requiem mass at St. Saviour's Church, Eighth Avenue and Sixth Street, Brooklyn. Burial will be in Calvary Cemetery.

Mrs. Sharp was born in the parish of old St. Patrick's Cathedral and attended St. Patrick's Academy. She had been a resident of Brooklyn for forty-five years. She left seven children, the Rev. John Kean Sharp of Oakdale, L. I.; Dr. Clayton Sharp of Westbury, Francis X. Sharp, Mrs. Henry Jackson, Mrs. Frederick Rath and Gertrude Eugenia Sharp.

LEGION SPURNS WET ACTION

Massachusetts Convention Rules Out Move for State Law's Repeal.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass., July 26 (AP).—An attempt of Clement A. Norton of Cambridge to place the State Department of the American Legion on record as favoring the repeal of the Massachusetts "baby Volstead act" failed in the convention here today when State Commander John J. O'Connell upheld the ruling of Harold P. Redden, chairman of the resolutions committee, that the matter was not one properly to come before the convention. Declining to accept the course of the resolutions committee, Norton attempted to get action on the floor of the convention, but he was ruled out of order by the chairman.

Richard F. Paul of Canton was elected State Commander, defeating Thomas F. Quinn of Natick.

State Vice Commander Frank H. Foy of Quincy reported a membership for the State of 45,156. An invitation was received from Mayor D. R. Winter of Springfield to hold the 1936 convention in that city, which that year will observe its tercentenary.

PLAN "NOISELESS" SUBWAY.

Chicago Engineers Seek Aid of Acoustics Authority on New Tube.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, July 26.—In one respect at least an effort will be made in the first Chicago subway design to surpass any passenger tunnel in the world. In no other subway, engineers believe, has any serious effort been made to reduce the rattle and roar. In the State Street bore, between Eighteenth Street and Chicago Avenue, it is planned to reduce the noise to a minimum.

R. F. Kelker, chief engineer of the subway, and Alfred Brahdy, representative of Robert Ridgeway, chief consulting engineer, who conferred today with Professor James M. White of the University of Illinois on the anti-noise methods, have about decided to ask the aid of Dr. F. R. Watson, professor of experimental physics of the university, who is creditd with being a leading authority on acoustics.

PINEAPPLE SHIPMENTS BIG.

Consignments From Hawaii Aid Western Freight Situation.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 26.—The movement of the 1930 pineapple crop, said to be the largest for many years, from Hawaii to the mainland is now at its peak and the large consignments of canned pineapples are doing much to ameliorate the eastbound intercoastal freight situation.

Today the Matson Line freighter Maunalei, which arrived from the Hawaiian Islands Friday night, began unloading the world's record canned pineapple shipment. This consisted of 354,954 cases, or 9,237 tons.

An encouraging feature of the pineapple situation is that the entire crop is reported already sold.

CALLS ROOSEVELT UNFAIR TO WILSON

Bainbridge Colby, in Current History, Says 'Inferiority Complex' Inspired Attacks.

MISS MAYO DOUBTS GANDHI

Article Questions Sincerity of Indian Leader's Policy on "Untouchables" —Many Topics Discussed.

Former Secretary of State Bainbridge Colby, who was closely and officially identified with both President Roosevelt and President Wilson, having been in the Cabinet of the latter and later his law partner, contributes to the August number of Current History an article in which he contrasts the two men, reaching his conclusions from social and official contact. His article is suggested by Owen Wister's memoirs of Roosevelt in which are quoted some caustic references by Roosevelt to Wilson.

Mr. Colby censures Roosevelt, his formre ally and close associate. "Roosevelt suffered under an inferiority complex with regard to Wilson," he writes. In the things which Roosevelt aspired to do well but succeeded in doing only indifferently, Wilson was a master, Mr. Colby says; especially true was this in the field of scholarship. This feeling of inferiority was the real drive behind Roosevelt's hostility to Woodrow Wilson, the writer continues, a hostility which became a devouring animosity when Roosevelt realized that he, who in his own mind had been cast for the rôle of President, was in the wings during one of the greatest dramas in human history. "His bitter sense of bafflement and frustration," Mr. Colby says, "found vent in the railing diatribes which he directed at Woodrow Wilson."

Miss Katherine Mayo, author of "Mother India," in an article in the August Current History depicts Gandhi in a new light. By quoting his own official utterances she proves that his attitude toward the 60,000,000 Indian "untouchables" is inconsistent and strongly smacks of insincerity. Her picture of "the holy man" of India totally differs from the general estimate of the man. She contends that he has used these unfortunate outcasts as his political tools and has deserted them in their hour of direst need. As a result, they have turned from him and are supporting British rule rather than commit their fate to Indian hands. Miss Mayo cites numerous quotations to sustain her position. A comprehensive summary of the second volume of the Simon report on India follows Miss Mayo's article.

A Really American Literature.

A truly American literature has appeared in the United States in the last two decades, declares V. F. Calverton. As America has risen to world power, it is declared, the old influence of England has been left behind and a new literature has emerged, "confident of its own talent and seeking no other approval than its own." The general theme of this new literature is held to be the "inability of the individual to find ample expression for himself in a corporate mechanistic society."

Floyd L. Carlisle, chairman of the Niagara Hudson Power Company, declares in another article in the August Current History that public ownership or regulation of power utilities will not benefit the public and consumer. The hope of the consumer for lower rates, it is argued, lies rather in sound economics and able, public-spirited management, "in the economic sources that we have, plus a standard of morality in the management of the corporation that truthfully has a public point of view as well as a private one."

Japan, socially, economically and politically, has become a modern country, writes Professor Harold S. Quigley of the University of Minnesota. In spite of depressions and disasters, he asserts, the nation has had an essentially sound economic development since the World War, which gave a heightened dignity and influence to labor, and this is the most significant development in the Japanese social order. A new order has been furthered by the younger generation, which has adopted all the outward marks of Occidental culture and manners, it is asserted, but governmental policy is in the hands of the old aristocracy and the new plutocracy and as a result is generally conservative. The chief diplomatic problem of Japan, Professor Quigley declares, is to assure the nations of the world that her interests in China will not close the door of equal opportunity in that nation nor stultify China's efforts at reorganization.

Soviet's Bill of Damages.

American military intervention in Russia in 1918-19 furnishes the basis for a bill of damages which the Soviet Government has compiled for future presentation to the United States, declares Professor F. L. Schuman of the University of Chicago. The Soviet Union, he says, argues that by international law this intervention was illegal and that such claims for damages would be valid. Such claims, however, "would be raised only in connection with the claims of private American citizens for payment on the Czarist bonds and for nationalized property." The claims of private American citizens against Russia are a part of the basis of the American attitude of non-recognition of the Soviet Union, it is pointed out. To clarify this attitude the full text of the American note, written by Secretary Colby on Aug. 10, 1920, refusing to recognize the Soviet Government, is printed.

Two articles on the critical position of Christian missions in China appear in the August issue of the magazine. Hallett Abend declares that "the day of the missionaries in China seems to be rapidly drawing to a close," while Frank Rawlinson, editor of the Chinese Recorder of Shanghai, believes that the day of the missionaries is waning but that the changes caused by the revolution have brought about among the Chinese a tendency to "simplify the Christian religion and to refocus Christian faith" free from foreign missionaries.

Various Topics Discussed.

Among other special features of August Current History are: An explanation of the purpose of the new institute of law at Johns Hopkins, by Joseph S. Ames, president of the university; an explanation of Great Britain's attitude on the liquor problem, by the Rev. W. C. McLeod; an analysis of the use of insanity pleas in court procedure, by Winifred Overholser, director of the department of mental diseases in Massachusetts, and a discussion of the trends of birth control in Europe, by Guy Irving Burch, executive secretary of the Population Bureau. The French Foreign Legion is described by Sidney E. Whitman without any of its traditional romance and glamour. J. A. Stevenson is the author of an article on the new Hudson Bay Port at Churchill, which is being developed by the Canadian Government to provide the farmers of the prairie country with a more direct and cheaper route to European markets, and Carl L. W. Meyer describes the progress made in unraveling the difficulties attendant upon America's adherence to the World Court.

"By considering the needs of Latin America more broadly, we can ultimately better serve our own needs," writes Carleton Beals. In the past Latin America has been the field for reckless and ruthless exploitation by Americans, he declares, but the tide seems to be turning and bringing as a result the States of Latin America into the orbit of world civilization.

The issue closes with summaries of the month's activities in the fifty-two nations of the world, written by fourteen American historians.

BAMBERGERS LAY PLAN TO BAPTIZE BABY TODAY

Seek to End Chicago Controversy by Christening—Watkins Considering Injunction.

CHICAGO, July 26 (AP).—The Watkins-Bamberger baby mix-up threatened tonight to become even more of a tangle tomorrow, when the baby in the Bamberger home is scheduled formally to receive the name of Bamberger at a baptismal service in St. Raphael's Catholic Church.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Bamberger announced plans for the baptism tonight following a conference with their attorney, and reiterated their conviction that, despite the decision of scientists to the contrary, they have their own baby.

Mr. and Mrs. William Watkins and their attorney, notified of the plan, said they were considering an injunction to prevent the baptism ceremony.

Earlier in the day, Mr. Watkins's attorney, Barratt O'Hara, had announced plans to sue the Englewood Hospital, where the two baby boys were born thirty-six days ago, for $100,000 damages. He was also seeking a way to bring suit to recover for the Watkinses the baby now in the Bamberger home.

Meanwhile, a group of Chicago women prominent in civic work, arranged for a mass meeting of mothers next week to demand that maternity hospitals take proper precautions to prevent future confusion in the identity of children.

ACT ON MAMARONECK BEACH

Officials to Alter Sewage Disposal to Avoid Pollution.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., July 26.—County Health Commissioner Matthias Nicoll Jr., who prohibited further bathing in Long Island Sound from the Mamaroneck Beach because of the pollution of the water there, was advised today that the Mamaroneck Village Board, despite the objections of Mayor William E. Lyon, had voted to carry out Dr. Nicoll's suggestion and use the county outflow for the disposal of sewage. The county outflow runs far enough into the Sound to remove the danger of polluting the beaches.

At the same time officials of the Westchester County Park Commission announced that a test of water in the Sound off Glen Island Beach, made by Dr. H. von Wedel, a bacteriologist, showed that the water there was not near the danger point as had previously been charged by Acting Mayor Stanley W. Church of New Rochelle. Mr. Church said a test of the water off Glen Island showed the presence of 1,000 bacteria per cubic foot. Dr. von Wedel's test showed only 200 bacteria per cubic foot.

ASKS HEARING ON PIERS.

Senator Wolber Wants Manhattan-Jersey Agreement on Extensions.

A public hearing on the proposed agreement between New York City and New Jersey for pierhead extension in the Hudson River is suggested in a letter which State Senator Joseph Wolber of Essex County addressed yesterday to J. Spencer Smith, chairman of the State Board of Commerce and Navigation of New Jersey.

Mr. Wolber expresses fear in the letter that the agreement might not give New Jersey what it seeks in development of the waterfront at Bayonne and Jersey City.

FINANCIAL SUNDAY, JULY 27, 1930. The New York Times SUNDAY, JULY 27, 1930. FINANCIAL

MODERATE DECLINE IN WEEK'S BUSINESS

Reaction Due Largely to the Temporary Shut-Downs by Industrial Plants.

UPTURN IS BELIEVED NEAR

Leading Economists Agree That July Will Witness Worst of the Depression.

MERCHANDISE STOCKS LOW

Rush of Buying Expected When Revival Comes—Reports From Federal Reserve Areas.

Further moderate declines in the principal indices characterized the past week's business news. Although there is a wide-spread improvement in sentiment, expressed in the general opinion that "things are now so bad the only change can be for the better," no statistical evidence of that improvement has yet appeared.

Such common indicators of business activity as building contracts, freight car loadings, automobile output, steel and electrical production, bank clearings and commodity price levels have failed to show any improvement as yet. After allowance for seasonal trends, all of these showed declines for the past week.

At the same time, the well-nigh universal agreement among leading economists and statisticians that July will witness the bottom of the depression has taken hold upon sentiment in the financial district and is being reflected in improved prices for securities on both the stock and bond markets.

Much of the reaction shown last week by the business indicators was to be expected. Automobile production sank to a low level as a result of the suspension of activity by several important plants, including the Ford organization. This in turn affected the steel industry, where many plants have also announced temporary shut-downs. Operations for the industry as a whole, according to The Iron Age, were unchanged at 56 per cent of capacity.

Freight car loadings for the week ended July 12 totaled 915,985, which was an advance of 123,844 over the previous holiday week, but still about 16,000 below the figures for the week preceding the holiday.

The commodity price level showed a small decline, bringing The Annalist index of wholesale commodity prices down 1 point to 122.0, compared with 150.4 a year ago. Wheat lost some ground during the week, while cotton dropped to a new low for the year. Copper was sold during the week at 11 cents.

The figures for bank clearings again showed a substantial drop, falling below the level of the previous week and showing a reduction of 27.2 per cent from the corresponding week of last year. The week's record of failures was again large for this time of year and substantially above the total for the corresponding week of last year.

Reports by telegraph from the various Federal Reserve Districts to THE NEW YORK TIMES generally reflected the midsummer slackness, although here and there some revival is noted. Stocks of merchandise, it is observed, are lower than they have been in years and manufacturers anticipate a rush of orders when consumer buying begins to show increase.

WEEK'S TRADE SLOW HERE.

But Stock Market's Rise Is Said to Indicate Optimism.

Trade in the New York area continued slow last week, but there was a noticeable disposition to take a more hopeful attitude toward the Fall prospects. This found expression chiefly in the stock market, where the week ended with a sharp upturn in prices.

Money market conditions became even easier than before during the latter part of the week. Extension of the 1 per cent bill-buying rate of the Federal Reserve Bank up to seventy-five days averted a threatened increase in bill rates and was taken as offering assurance that the bank of issue would keep credit easy for the Fall demands.

Additional shipments of $17,000,000 gold to France were reported during the week and a new movement to Canada got under way, taking $5,500,000 out of this market.

Of ninety-six lines of business in New York City reporting to Bradstreet's last week, one was better than a year ago, twenty-three equal to and seventy-two below last year. No lines reported better collections, fifteen were equal to and eighty-one below a year ago. Following is a summary of reporting lines:

High Corn Prices Spur Offers Here From Foreign Growers

Special to The New York Times.
CHICAGO, July 26.—Owing to the unusually high price of corn in the United States, foreign grain is said to be offered at the seaboard from Argentina and other countries.

A price of 93 cents a bushel, duty paid, was reported asked for Argentine corn at Boston. This was within 5½ cents of No. 2 yellow in the local sample market.

YUGOSLAVIA PLANS $250,000,000 LOANS

Government Reported Making Preliminary Overtures Here and in London.

TO STABILIZE EXCHANGE

Funds Also Needed for Improvement Program for Railways, Harbors, Agriculture and Mines.

With the German and Austrian bond issues successfully marketed, other European governments are pressing bankers here and in London for major loans. One of the latest of these is the post-war kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, popularly known as Yugoslavia. If the current reports in Wall Street are approximately correct the Yugoslav Government desires to obtain loans totaling $250,000,000, part this year and the remainder over a period of years.

A substantial part of this amount is needed definitely to stabilize the country's exchange, which, for a number of years, although not stabilized officially, has been held near 1.76 cents a dinar. In addition, the government has mapped out an improvement program for the national railways involving about 26,000,000,000 dinars, or more than $460,000,000.

Other improvement projects include $26,500,000 for harbors and ports, $15,000,000 for the Ministry of Agriculture and $8,500,000 for the Ministry of Mines. Bankers here regard this program an ambitious one, even for a nation which comprises former Serbia, Montenegro, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Dalmatia and Slovenia.

Financing Here in 1922 and 1927.

The only post-war financing done here by the Yugoslav Government consisted of an issue of $25,000,000 Series A 8s offered in June, 1922, and an issue of $30,000,000 Series B 7s offered in April, 1927. These issues were a part of an authorized amount of $100,000,000, the remainder of which, $45,000,000, was never marketed. These loans were a first charge on all government monopolies, including matches, tobacco, kerosene, salt and stamp duties, and also on customs duties, subject to pre-war debt service on the debt of Serbia and Montenegro.

Overtures for a new loan are said to be preliminary in character, as it is believed that definite consideration will not be given such a loan until Autumn at the earliest. It is pointed out, however, that notwithstanding the marked improvement in the prices of high-grade foreign issues this week, second-grade loans have not responded to any extent. In view of this, the relative firmness of the market for the Yugoslav 8s and 7s and the State-guaranteed Mortgage Banks 7s has stood out in some contrast.

Economic Progress Shown.

The firmness of these issues has not been ascribed to the pending financing but rather to the economic progress of the country reported in the last year and a half. New loans for constructive purposes, of course, would strengthen the security behind the present issues outstanding.

It is believed that a new loan, if marketed this year, would be handled by an international banking group, with the major portion of the issue underwritten in New York and London. The size of the loan would necessarily depend largely upon the condition of the bond market at the time of issuance. For purposes of comparison, the American portion of the recent German international loan amounted to $98,250,000 and of the Austrian international loan marketed this month to $25,000,000.

New foreign financing done here this year has been running far heavier than in 1929. The total of such flotations in the first half of 1930 exceeded by approximately $100,000,000 the total for the entire year of 1929. In 1929, however, much foreign financing was done here which does not appear on the record, for the reason that it consisted chiefly of bank loans in which no public financing was involved.

INVESTMENT TRUSTS TEND TO ONE TYPE

Fixed and Management Concerns Show Disposition to Swerve From Original Bases.

MANY INNOVATIONS TRIED

Wall Street Looks Forward to Starting of Company With Restrictive Rules.

A tendency toward a further interlocking of characteristics of investment trusts of the fixed and management type, two types that until recently had been built on widely differing principles, has been noted by investment trust leaders as one of the interesting developments in the evolution of this form of financial enterprise.

A heated controversy has continued regarding the merits of the two types ever since the first of the year, when management trusts had apparently slipped into disfavor with the public, and there were formed fixed or rigid trusts, in which the underlying assets, once chosen, could not be changed, and which attained wide popularity among small investors.

The fixed trusts were sold largely on the assertion that underlying assets represented the greatest industries in the country, with the largest promise of growth. The managements trust had been sold on the basis that no such list of securities could be chosen for a long-time investment and that shrewd ever-attentive care must be given to reap the greatest and safest return from the funds placed in the trust by investors.

It has been said that the attitude of the management trust is that of Wall Street, while that of the fixed trust is that of an estate trustee. The first is anxious to give the investor as much of an appreciation on his money as possible, while the second is anxious to insure as safe and steady an income for the investor as possible.

Portfolio Rules Loosened.

It has been noted recently, however, that several so-called fixed trusts have been letting down the rigidity of their portfolios. This was first seen when a fixed trust announced that it had placed in the hands of its trustee an alternate list of securities virtually as large as the original list. This meant that substitutions could be made from time to time, bringing the first element of management into this type of trust.

Another step, allowing for a broader type of management, was to invest a large percentage, 30 or 40 per cent, of the fixed trust's underlying assets in the stock of a general investment company controlled by the same group as the fixed trust. This meant that this percentage was dependent for its return on the effectiveness of the management.

Recently a fixed trust was announced in which an "initial" list of holdings was given. The implication was that this list would be maintained for some time. At the same time, however, the brochure contained the announcement that a management contract had been signed and no restrictions as to changes in portfolio were published.

Another step, to which Wall Street is looking forward with interest, is the sponsorship of a restricted management trust by a group already backing a management trust. This will be the first generally known attempt by a management trust group to bring out anything that corresponds to a fixed trust.

High-Rated Stocks Specified.

This new trust, it is understood, will be limited in its portfolio to stocks of the highest rating companies, according to established rating authorities. It will be organized in much the same fashion as a fixed trust, with its shares representing small fractions of underlying standard blocks of stock. And it will sell more on the strength of portfolio than of management.

The main argument for this forthcoming type is that in case some issue, now getting top rating, slips into disfavor (though it may still continue its dividend), it may be dropped and a newcomer to highest-rating favor may be substituted.

One main argument of the management trust protagonists against the fixed trust is on the point of a cash deposit that each shareholder must make in many of them against a possible future lapse in dividends. They contend that if dividends must eventually be paid from this reserve, the process amounts to little more than a payment out of principal. It is understood this new type will have no such reserve.

Another contention against the fixed trusts concerns their policy of selling out and distributing, within certain stipulated limits of time, all stock dividends and stock split-ups. In the case of split-ups, defenders of management maintain that this reduces the equity back of each share in the hands of the public, and so creates a possibility of eventally lessened income return on the trust's

NO BAR IN CITY SEEN TO UTILITY MERGERS

Public Service Commission's Refusal to Permit Sale of Coke Ovens Considered.

AIMS OF KOPPERS GROUP

Supply of By-Products Desired for Distribution in Metropolitan District.

Prospects for a merger of the Brooklyn Union Gas Company into the Consolidated Gas Company of New York will not be hampered seriously by objections raised by the Public Service Commission in refusing permission to the Brooklyn Union Company to sell its coke gas plant in Greenpoint to a subsidiary of the Koppers Company, by which it is controlled. This is the opinion advanced by close students of the problem, which, although not actively under consideration at the present, is likely to come up again in a few months. A plan to merge Brooklyn Union into Consolidated Gas failed in 1928 because of lack of agreement on a price for the former's shares at the time when the Brooklyn Edison Company was acquired and merged into the larger system.

It has been reported that the Koppers plan to acquire the Greenpoint coke-oven works of the Brooklyn Union Gas Company and to sell the gas to the latter company under a twenty-five-year contract, was formulated originally because the Koppers interests desired to expand their coke and by-products business in Greater New York and therefore wished to have a supply available within a short distance of their market.

By-Products Being Sold.

The Brooklyn Coke and By-Products Corporation, formed by the Koppers to handle their Brooklyn business and also to operate the Greenpoint plant, had the commission permitted its acquisition, is temporarily handling the sales of coke and various chemical by-products derived from the manufacture of gas at the Greenpoint works.

While it is believed to be possible that Brooklyn Union Gas will seek to make this connection permanent, in view of the company's reported disinclination to undertake the merchandising of coke and by-products on its own behalf, it has been learned authoritatively that no policy has been formulated since the commission's decision and that none is likely to be adopted immediately.

The Consolidated Gas Company, on the other hand, controls the National Coke and Coal Company, which handles exclusively the sale of its coke and by-products. Sales of the coke and coal company last year were 95 per cent greater than in the previous year. About 75 per cent of the sales of coke was at retail, the coke being delivered by the company's vehicles, while 25 per cent was sold in cargo lots alongside the Hunts Point plant. The Koppers interests directly maintain an organization in Greater New York to handle coke sales.

In view of the situation, observers are wondering whether or not a deal by Consolidated Gas for the Koppers holdings in Brooklyn Union Gas, which are estimated at 30 per cent or more, would take into account the Koppers' unmistakable desire to expand their coke sales business in the New York area. It is even assumed that one condition of a sale of Brooklyn Union stock might be a proposal by the Koppers to acquire the National Coke and Coal business as well as to maintain its coke business in Brooklyn.

Possibilities of Mergers.

In addition to working control of Brooklyn Union Gas, held indirectly by the Koppers-Mellon interests, the

STORE-DOOR SERVICE FACES NEW PROBLEM

B. & O. Abandons Deliveries Under Rivals' Threat of Keener Competition.

TRUNK LINES TO CONFER

Terminal Concerns Oppose but Civic Groups Favor Plan if Properly Regulated.

The problem of store-door delivery in New York City, which a few months ago brought out a lengthy report from the Interstate Commerce Commission, came into a new significance last week as a result of the action of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. This trunk line began store-door delivery on July 15 in Manhattan and last week several terminal companies here brought action to cause the B. & O. to desist from the practice. On Friday the B. & O. announced the practice would be discontinued.

The action of the B. & O., however, did not result from the opposition of the terminal companies. It resulted from a threat by other railroads serving New York to carry the system of store-door delivery further than the B. & O. had established it. The situation will be discussed by the Eastern trunk line executives on Friday.

Meanwhile, the New York Central Railroad has made preparations for the construction of a terminal for the lower west side which would cost from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, with the possibility that the work might be commenced in September. This station would be built on a site comprising four blocks, bounded by Clarkson, Spring, Washington and West Streets. This terminal would provide for trucking service.

Attitude of the Commission.

Several years ago the railroads established a system of store-door delivery known by the name of "constructive delivery stations." These stations were imaginary points on the west side to which the railroads terminating at New Jersey paid the hauls and from which the consignees paid the hauls. The system gave rise to alleged abuses. It was said, for example, that in some cases railroads paid so much of their share to the truckman that he was able to carry the freight the rest of the way with little or no charge to the consignee. However, the commission admitted that the store-door delivery system was right in principle.

The Port of New York Authority also subscribed to the principle of store-door delivery, and it has completed plans for an inland freight station on the west side for the movement of less-than-carload freight.

The New York Central met the system of constructive deliveries by the roads terminating in New Jersey with one of its own and is apparently insuring against future developments by planning for a freight station on the west side which will be a substantial improvement over all others.

Regulation of the Service.

In recommending store-door delivery the B. & O. endeavored to meet the requirements laid down by the Interstate Commerce Commission in its decision. It made a point of careful regulation of its service in order that the right proportion of trucking charges should be made to carrier and consignee. Under the old constructive station system the trucks entered New York at any convenient point. Under the B. & O.'s system the trucking is checked at Pier 21, East River. The Merchants Association and other civic organizations approved the B. & O. plan and recommended that other railroads adopt it.

The terminal companies which opposed the B. & O. plan were the Bush Terminal Railroad, New York Dock Railway, Brooklyn Eastern District Terminal and Jay Street Terminal. They charge that the plan violates the commission's ruling.

The chief advantage of store-door delivery is said to be that it eliminates expensive pier transfers.

EASY CREDIT IN FALL NOW SEEMS LIKELY

Federal Reserve Rate Cut on the Long-Maturity Bills Heartens Bankers.

MOVE VIEWED AS TIMELY

Concern Had Been Felt Over Substantial Gold Exports From This Market.

As a result of developments in the money market last week, the expectation of firmer credit conditions, recently held by a number of bankers, has been dispelled. It is now generally agreed that the Fall demand for money will be met by continued easy rates and the rise in quotations for credit extending into the Autumn, which appeared imminent a few days ago, has been replaced by an actual slackening of such charges.

The explanation of this change in point of view is found in an apparently minor change in the bill-buying rate of the Federal Reserve Bank. The change affected only bills of from forty-six to seventy-five days maturity and consisted of a reduction of one-eighth of 1 per cent in the existing buying rate. Coming at the time it did, this action was interpreted by bankers as a clear assurance on the part of the central banking authorities that the bank would actively address itself to the maintenance of the current ease in money.

The firming influences which had appeared in the money market a little more than a week ago were principally psychological, in the opinion of leading authorities. They consisted of a moderate firming in the longer time money rates and a sharp drop in demand for bankers' bills of more than forty-five days maturity.

Glut of Short-Term Money.

These developments came in the face of a glut of short-term money so extreme that it was found difficult to dispose of call money at 1 per cent, and the market for Federal Reserve funds was knocked down to the unprecedentedly low figure of one-quarter of 1 per cent. As a general rule, Federal Reserve funds are priced at about the level of the rediscount rate. The fact that they are available at one-tenth of the latter rate shows, according to bankers, that a large number of banks have funds for which they can find no profitable employment.

This condition is one to cause extreme concern among bankers. The margin between what a bank pays its depositors for the use of their funds and what it receives as the proceeds of lending and investing these deposits is generally very small. If a bank continued long to pay interest on its deposits while at the same time finding no employment for a substantial part of them, it would, obviously, soon have to retire from business.

In the present instance the difficulties of the banks arise from the fact that they all want to keep the major portion of their money in a highly liquid use. Competition for such short, readily marketable investments as bankers' bills, treasury notes and bills, and call money has driven the rates on these forms of credit to extremely low levels. At the same time, bonds, mortgage loans and other more extended investment vehicles are unpopular with the banks and carry comparatively high yields.

Fears of Bankers Allayed.

In explanation of this preference for short-term investments and reluctance to tie up funds for longer periods, many bankers have expressed skepticism as to the "genuine" character of the present ease in money. It is thought by many of them that the current low money rates could quickly tighten should world business affairs return to more normal conditions and commercial demand for credit revive.

Many bankers are fearful lest, if they now invest their surplus funds in loans extending over a considerable period, they will be caught short of money when their commercial customers return to the market.

It was this point of view which made the banks reluctant to buy bankers' bills of any but the shortest maturity recently. It was thought that when the expected revival takes place this Fall, holders of such bills might find themselves

Lewisohn Says Copper at 11c Is Below Cost at Many Mines

Sam A. Lewisohn, vice president of the Miami Copper Company, in discussing the present copper situation in Metals, the monthly supplement of The Daily Metal Reporter, says that an 11c price is very near rock bottom.

"It is the lowest price since 1902," he adds. "Further, it is 3.50c below the ten-year average of 1920-1929 and close to 8c below the previous ten-year average. The 11c price is below the cost of production of many of the marginal mines. The table compiled by the United States Tariff Commission shows that approximately 46 per cent of the domestic output in 1929 cost 11c and over.

"With the price of silver at the lowest point in more than a century those marginal copper mines in which silver figured as a by-product and which served to bring down the cost of production, will find it all the more difficult to maintain operations."

INDUSTRY REVISING OPERATING METHODS

Greater Efficiency Viewed as Vital Need in Changing Economic Conditions.

CLOSER SCRUTINY OF COSTS

Adjustment by General Motors Seen as Notable Example of the New Policy.

The change in economic conditions that took place last Fall following the stock crash has not only resulted in a large number of important organizations materially improving their operating efficiency but has enabled many of them, especially the more conservative ones, to embark on expansion programs under more or less normal conditions, according to students of economic trends. As a result of this policy, which in some cases has been compulsory, it is believed that when the present business adjustment has been completed many of the principal companies will be in an especially favorable position to reap the full benefits of the recovery.

During the past few years there has been almost a "mushroom" growth in a large number of companies. In fact, since the World War started in 1914, the United States, with the possible exception of a comparatively brief period during the deflation of 1921, has been experiencing a phenomenal industrial growth. It is stated that this in itself would permit considerable inefficiencies to creep in, as business conditions were such that large profits could be made under most any method of operation. Comparatively little thought was given to the cost of putting an article in the hands of the ultimate consumer, since it would generally be purchased at a price to yield a profit to the manufacturer.

Effect of Widespread Mergers.

Shortly after the deflation period of 1921, a great number of mergers and combinations was reported, commencing with electric power and light companies and finally including every industry. Practically every company embarked on an ambitious expansion program which necessitated the raising of unusually large sums of money through the sale of securities to the public, mostly common stocks. This in turn it is believed, was largely responsible for the unprecedented public interest in the security markets, as opportunities to make profits were great. These mergers and expansion programs were expected to result in economies in operation and management, but in many instances the falling off in business showed a number of glaring inefficiences, with the result that it was necessary for many companies completely to readjust their operations.

As the industrial changes in the past few years were almost revolutionary in character and affected nearly every company in all branches of industry, a return to conditions approximating those just prior to the break in the stock market last Fall, it is believed, will require some time. The zeal with which some of the larger companies have gone about getting their "house in order" is held to indicate, however, that in some in-

Schwab Sees American Industry Emerge Triumphant After Period of Severe Test

American industry gives every promise of emerging with flying colors from the period of severe test through which it has been passing, according to Charles M. Schwab, chairman of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation.

Mr. Schwab said he still felt as he did when, at the May meeting of the American Iron and Steel Institute, he contended that the steel industry had met its test with conspicuous success. In his opinion, no industry has more ably weathered the difficulties attendant upon and growing out of the greatest stock market collapse in history.

Mr. Schwab said it was a mistake to expect every year to be a record year in business. "We should realize," he said, "that comparisons for the purpose of gauging our present progress should be made with normal years rather than with last year, an abnormally good twelvemonth."

Mr. Schwab cited the superior management in American business and industry as the underlying basis of his confidence in a complete recovery.

"Like any other organized activity or institution, fundamentally, business is the product of the individuals who constitute it," he said. "The people responsible for the steel industry's impregnable position are steel men themselves, most of whom started in overalls and who have grown up in the business, and the real responsibility for our continuing progress rests with the men who have sponsored the accomplishments of the past. This business is one that essentially calls for courage, initiative and vision."

Mr. Schwab said that the steel industry was in a sounder condition today than ever before and that, in spite of temporary setbacks, a prosperous future was assured. In equipment and organization, he continued, the industry was on a stable and strong basis. Vast sums, he pointed out, had been spent on rehabilitation and expansion, resulting in remarkable economies in operation.

Mr. Schwab said he considered good management "the very essence of sound business progress." "By good management," he said, "I do not mean works management alone, but management in its broadest aspects, which includes, in addition to the proper handling of men, machines, materials and money, the underlying position and trend of the industry in its relation to the whole economic structure. I mean also business statesmanship, which is coming to be regarded in the light of its true importance to the well-being of the people."

GRACE'S LARGE PAY STIRS BONUS DEBATE

$1,623,753 Received in Year by Bethlehem Steel's Head Seen as Peak for Executives.

IS ALL EARNED, SOME SAY

Others in Wall Street District Contend Excessive Rewards Are Not Deserved.

FAVOR WIDER DISTRIBUTION

Systems of U. S. Steel and General Motors in Paying Extras to Many Are Praised.

With the disclosure that Eugene G. Grace received a bonus of $1,623,753 in 1929 as president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, Wall Street opened a lively debate on the broad question of extra compensation for executives and, specifically, the percentage of earnings that a corporation is justified in paying in the form of bonuses.

Apparently the Bethlehem Steel Corporation has set a new high record in the sums paid to individual executives. Testimony given in Youngstown, Ohio, in the suit of Cyrus S. Eaton and associates to prevent the merger of Bethlehem and the Youngstown Sheet and Tube Company showed that a group of Bethlehem executives received a total of $36,493,668 in bonuses from 1911 to 1929, inclusive.

While the amount paid to Mr. Grace topped all the others and probably was the largest in 1929 ever received by an American corporation official, it was disclosed also that three vice presidents last year received in excess of $375,000 apiece in bonuses.

The Eaton interests are contending that the bonus payments are excessive and are not in the best interests of stockholders. They have sought to show, also, that the bonuses would be increased by a merger of Youngstown and Bethlehem, since the business of the consolidated unit would be much greater than that of Bethlehem as at present constituted.

Opinions on Bonuses Vary in Wall St.

Opinions in Wall Street vary sharply as to the desirability of large bonuses. It is pointed out by some that Bethlehem's high prosperity last year was the result of aggressive and intelligent management and that, therefore, the principal officials are entitled to large compensation. Elsewhere the prevalent view seems to be that the bonuses are out of proportion to those paid by other large and well-managed companies.

It was made clear last week that there will be repercussions from the Bethlehem bonus disclosures and that they may reach the point of a revision of the plan. In fact, it was strongly suggested last week that the Bethlehem directors may see fit soon to alter the plan drastically, although there has been no official intimation to that effect.

Many in Wall Street drew comparisons last week between Bethlehem's bonus plan and the other two best known plans, those of the United States Steel Corporation and of the General Motors Corporation. Only fourteen or fifteen of the Bethlehem executives, it was revealed, participate in that company's distribution, whereas under the United States Steel Corporation's plan more than 1,000 executives and managers are benefited. The Steel Corporation disburses a greater amount in bonuses than does Bethlehem, but the individual awards are much smaller.

Percentages Paid by Bethlehem.

In 1929 Bethlehem executives received in bonuses 6.2835 per cent of net earnings. The percentage has been as high as 8.16 per cent and as low as 3.89. Last year's total disbursements, however, were the largest on record.

In the Steel Corporation, where officers are not compensated so generously as in Bethlehem, the most that can be paid in the form of bonuses is 2½ per cent of net profits in a single year. The plan provides that when net profits exceed $100,000,000 but do not go above $150,000,000 the amount set aside for the bonus plan shall be 2 per cent; when the net profits exceed $150,000,000 but not $200,000,000 the amount shall be 2¼ per cent; when such profits exceed $200,000,000 the amount set aside shall be 2½ per cent. No amount may be set aside in any year when the net profits for the preceding year do not exceed $100,000,000.

The funds are distributed among the employes of the corporation and its subsidiaries and those actively engaged in the conduct of its and their business under orders of a committee of three stockholders, elected at the annual meeting of stockholders, none of the members of which committee shall be eligible to share in the distribution.

The purpose of the Steel Corporation's plan "is to accord to the employes of the corporation and its subsidiaries and those actively engaged in the conduct of its or their business, who, by their ability, industry and loyalty, have contributed in an unusual degree to the success of the corporation, participation in the profits of the corporation as special compensation for such contribution, and thus to stimulate a continuance of the same."

One Year's Service Is Minimum.

Employes to participate in the bonuses under the plan must have had at least one year's service with the corporation or one of its subsidiaries.

The judgment of the committee as to the services rendered by employes is final, and the committee has the power also to pay the bonuses wholly in cash or partly in cash, and the remainder in either the common or preferred stock of the corporation, the amount to be invested in stock for such purpose being left to the discretion of the committee. In addition, the committee has the right to

Odd Lots

Odd lot buying strengthens your financial holdings, because all of the burden is not on just one stock.

Unforeseen conditions might affect one stock. With your total holdings divided amongst eight or ten leading stocks a depression in any one of them would not materially affect you.

For safety—diversify your buying—buy odd lots!

FINANCIAL MARKETS

Moderate Recovery in Stocks, Trading More Active—Sterling at Month's Highest.

Yesterday's otherwise wholly uneventful week-end markets produced only two movements of particular interest; the further rise of sterling exchange to the highest rate since March, and an advance in corn which brought the price virtually to a level with wheat. In so far as our gold export to Paris and the accompanying high rate for French exchange reflect homeward transfer of European capital, the sterling market would naturally move with francs. It has already risen a full cent since the middle of June; a very unusual movement for this time of year. Even in 1927, when easy money here and the policy of the Federal Reserve were preparing the way for gold shipments to London in the Autumn, sterling hardly moved in the midsummer months, and at the end of July stood 1½ cent below yesterday's sight rate of $4.86⅝.

The continued rise of the corn market, which has advanced the price some 14 cents a bushel since the month began, was primarily response to news of damage to the crop through the extreme hot weather; it should also be observed that the earlier good promise of the crop had cut down the price of corn 25 cents from the earlier price of 1930. But the very exceptional fact that corn and wheat are now selling at virtually the same price was the point of special interest. Ordinarily, corn brings 20 to 30 cents a bushel less than wheat. The position was reversed in November, 1917, when corn got to $2.29 although wheat did not rise above $2.20; but that was because the corn market was then running free in the war inflation, whereas the wheat market was controlled by the government's guaranteed price.

The day's stock market did an unexpectedly large business, transactions reaching the highest Saturday total since the violent break of June. Prices advanced, but the changes were not of great importance; running mostly, even in the more active shares, only to 2 or 3 points.

Inertia on the stock market during most of last week was so complete as to suggest suspension of pretty much all normal activity. Like a sea which, after violent agitation of not long ago, had continued to toss about with decreased activity after the storm had passed, its surface was now disturbed only by ripples. The market's extreme inactivity was commonly ascribed to the season, but it may also be fairly taken as an accurate reflection of the financial and industrial situation. In view of the course of events during the past nine or ten months, no one is likely to deny that the stock market, which in 1929 and 1927 seemed to have lost all touch with the trend of industry, has regained its place as financial barometer. All the successive phases in the business situation during the present year—not excepting the midsummer relapse in trade—have been indicated beforehand on the Stock Exchange; which lends real interest to its present and future action.

The virtually motionless stock market of the moment might be taken to indicate uncertainty in the financial mind, or as foreshadowing continued hesitation in general business. This need not mean that there will be no change for the better in Autumn trade, as compared with the existing dullness. There will be such a change; it never has failed to come in the Autumn months; but the stock market is evidently not yet convinced of the scope and duration of the possible recovery. One of last week's commercial reviewers compared the financial and business situation to a ship in a dead calm, waiting for a tidal wave to sweep it along in a new direction. This was perhaps said in reminiscence of the sequel to the year of reaction, 1924, when agriculture and politics combined to reverse the business situation with really spectacular violence. In 1924 these coming events were foreshadowed on the Stock Exchange, where prices ran up 15 per cent in the Summer market. Any clear indication of an important turn in the general situation would be as quickly reflected on this year's market.

OHIO RIVER EDISON OFFER.

Commonwealth & Southern Sets Terms for Exchange of Stock.

The Commonwealth and Southern Corporation has offered to holders of 7 per cent preferred stock of the Ohio River Edison Company an exchange of their holdings for $6 series preferred stock of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation at one 7 per cent share for one $6 series share plus $10 in cash. The 7 per cent preferred stock of Ohio River Edison has been called for redemption in whole on Oct. 1, at $110 a share and accrued dividends.

Stockholders of the Pennsylvania-Ohio Power and Light Company, Northern Ohio Power and Light Company, Ohio Edison Company, Akron Steam Heating Company and London Light and Power Company have been advised that as a result of the merger of these companies into the Ohio Edison Company, holders of certificates should exchange their shares for new certificates of the Ohio Edison Company.

The capitalization of the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation on June 30 consisted of 17,601,375 option warrants to buy perpetually common shares at $30 a share; 34,011,010 common shares and 1,400,931 shares of $6 preferred stock, all no par.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

News, Comment and Incident, On the Stock Exchange and In the Financial Markets.

With a turnover slightly less than 1,000,000 shares, the advance was resumed by the general list on the Stock Exchange yesterday, but not at a pace to arouse any enthusiasm in Wall Street. To casual observers the market seemed nothing more than the usual colorless affair typical of Saturdays in midsummer. The authors of week-end market circulars were obliged to draw liberally upon their imaginations to supply reasons for the lazy advance of stocks, since nothing in the day's meager budget of news could be cited as a stimulus. The best gains—and these averaged between 2 and 3 points—were recorded in United States Steel, American Can, Vanadium, Westinghouse Electric, New York Central, J. I. Case, General Electric and Auburn Auto.

Prophecy on the Market.

Having in mind the numerous confident assertions that "business is scraping bottom," one professional speculator who says his sense of humor is the only thing salvaged in the wreck of his stock market operations remarked yesterday that the scraping process had been overdone. His thought was that too much synthetic confidence had been aroused. "What we need most," he insisted, "is a little silence on the part of the professional optimists." The comment was made in reply, however, not only that hopeful prophecy is popular at such a moment as this, but that unfavorable and sometimes even cautious or conditional prediction runs the danger of getting its author heartily disliked.

When Trade Reaction Should End.

With approach of Autumn, discussion of the question how long a major trade reaction traditionally lasts has become more energetic. The general view still is that our own experience does not point to a consecutive reactionary period of more than one year; from which it is widely inferred that, since business began to lose ground last Summer, the end of the readjustment should nearly have been reached. The record shows that the theory which gives a year to the reactionary movement is approximately correct, so far as regards the continuous downward movement. As to whether the movement of distinct revival has normally arrived after that interval, opinion differed. It was recalled that even in the deflation period, although the acute stage of readjustment lasted only from the middle of 1920 to the middle of 1921 and although the stock market recovered in the last half of 1921, that recovery did not extend to either trade or prices. Business depression grew no worse, and the fall of prices was gradually checked, but positive revival did not occur until many months later.

Steel Prices Steady.

For the past thirty days the prices of leading steel products have held steady without any significant change, it is stated. This has resulted in a general belief in the industry that the bottom in the price decline of about one year has been reached. Since prices have been around present levels, practically no price cutting is heard in the trade, probably due to the fact that profit margins have been reduced in some instances to or near the vanishing point. Lack of demand for nearly all products, with the exception of pipe for the oil and natural gas industry, however, practically precludes a substantial price advance during the next few months, it is believed.

Mexican Debt Agreement.

With the signing of the Mexican debt agreement last week, another difficult international financial problem is brought nearer to its solution. The agreement as concluded between the International Committee of Bankers on Mexico and the Mexican Finance Minister has still to meet the approval of the Mexican Congress and the bondholders. It is considered most likely, however, that this approval will be forthcoming. The International Committee of Bankers has in the past had the support of about 98 per cent of the bondholders and is expected to again receive their approval for its work.

New Utility Financing.

Unless investment bankers decide to bring out several railroad and industrial issues which have been under discussion during the last few days, it would appear that public utility financing will monopolize the bond market this week as it did last. Utility corporations have entered a period of expansion, and many of the recent consolidations have greatly simplified their financial structures. New borrowing has usually followed consolidations, as it has generally been the case that one strong company has been able to borrow to much better advantage than its constituent companies could separately. It is notable, however, that the sizes of the individual issues have been kept within reasonable bounds.

The Grain Rate Cut.

Railway men were naturally not particularly enthusiastic over the cut in grain export rates authorized by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Carrier officials have for many years felt that their industry was invariably the one selected to help out when economic depression threatened, although no administration had ever thought to suggest cuts in steel ingot prices or other similar practices when times became hard. They also instanced the cut in grain rates made last year at the request of the administration, which, they pointed out, made no appreciable difference in the movement of grain to seaboard.

Conspiring to Draw Gold.

Present controversy over the heavy export of gold from London, which cannot conveniently spare it, to Paris, which apparently does not need it, has again taken the shape of ascribing to the French gold importers ulterior motives reprehensible from the view of orderly finance. This contention has been answered by appeal to the French exchange rate in London, which has held so high as practically to force gold exports in settlement. Some of the older exchange bankers recalled last week a similar controversy which arose in our own market when Europe was drawing gold from the United States in 1892. That movement, which reached in twelve months $100,000,000, or much the largest in our history up to that time, brought accusations in and out of Congress that the exporting bankers were conspiring against the United States. Wall Street, which had largely participated in the feeling, was in the end convinced, against itself by a defense of the gold exporting bankers, which ingeniously pointed out that for every million dollars sent abroad the banking house had to sell $1,000,000 in sterling exchange, and that therefore these bankers were the strongest influence then operating to stop the rise in exchange.

Last Week's Movements of Gold.

Movements of gold at the port of New York last week attracted attention by the size of the exports to France and the start of the movement to Canada. Exports totaled $22,501,000, of which $17,001,000 was sent to France and $5,500,000 to Canada. Imports amounted to $1,457,000, of which $1,000,000 came from Uruguay, $334,000 from Brazil and the remaining $123,000 chiefly from other Latin-American countries. There was no change in the amount of gold held under earmark for foreign account at the Federal Reserve Bank, but additional shipments of gold from the Orient reached San Francisco. Two shipments of the metal aggregating $1,045,000 arrived at the western port from China and one of $500,000 from Japan. The net loss of gold to the country for the week was $19,499,000, after allowing for the imports both at New York and San Francisco, the largest for any week this year.

forced to liquidate them at a loss in order to secure the needed funds for Fall business needs.

By extending its bill buying rate of 1⅞ per cent up to seventy-five days last week, the Federal Reserve Bank did much to relieve such fears. Banks under the present conditions can buy ninety-day bills with the assurance that after holding the bills for fifteen days they will be able to "melt them down" at the Federal Reserve without sustaining a loss.

As a result, the action of the bank was followed by a sharp revival of bill buying on the part of the banks and bill dealers reported that a threatened increase in rates had been averted. The better tone in the bill market communicated itself to the market for time money and rates which had recently been advanced there were lowered.

Outlook for Autumn Needs.

Apart from its immediate effects, the action of the Federal Reserve Bank was regarded as significant. It was taken to mean that the central banking authorities are prepared to maintain easy money conditions for some time to come. It is now thought that the bank will assist the financing of the Fall needs of business and agriculture by adding materially to its bill holdings in the next few months. The belief was strengthened by the remarks of the Federal Reserve Board on the subject of the money market contained in the current Federal Reserve Bulletin. The board took upon itself entire responsibility for the easing of money rates since the first of the year, from which it was concluded that the board would continue to hold itself responsible for the money market throughout the latter and more critical part of the year.

The assurance of the Federal Reserve's concern for the continuance of easy money came at a particularly timely moment. In the last two weeks a substantial outward movement of gold from this market has got under way and promises to continue. Gold in the amount of $25,000,000 has been shipped to France and in the amount of $5,500,000 to Canada. This outflow, if continued, could not fail to have an effect upon credit in this market, unless it were offset by other factors.

latter own almost the entire outstanding capital of the Brooklyn Borough Gas Company through affiliated security companies. While it has been suggested that the two Brooklyn companies might be merged, the continued absence of any such movement has been interpreted in financial circles as indicative of a willingness to sell these holdings to Consolidated Gas, provided the right terms can be reached.

There has been no activity of late for a merger of Greater New York utilities, including the Long Island Lighting Company or of the Niagara Hudson Power and Consolidated Gas companies. The respective companies have been engaged in plans to eliminate outstanding minority interests and to dispense with intermediary holding companies wherever possible. Some months will be required before this work is completed. Prospects that a new holding company will be formed for Consolidated Gas, whose properties would be divided thereafter into independent electric and gas operating units, are also considered preliminary to a State-wide merger of utilities.

It is reported in financial circles that the electric branch of the Consolidated Gas system has shown greater improvement in recent months than the gas branch, and the company's plan to decrease rates for gas used in house heating is seen as a bold step to stimulate gas consumption in the company's territory. Reductions in house-heating gas rates were made in 1929 and 1928.

The number of house-heating installations at the end of 1929 was 1,317 and 505 gas house-heating and large volume water-heating installations were made in that year, an increase of about 50 per cent over the installations in 1928. Another development in 1929 was the installation of Ensign-Reynolds gas burners in three brick bake ovens which formerly were fired with coal, the first installation of equipment in this territory.

Continued progress in these branches has been made thus far in 1930, although complete figures are not available.

INVESTMENT TRUST INCREASES ASSETS

Sterling Securities Reports Net Income of $946,225 for First Half of Year.

LARGE REDUCTION IN LOANS

Profit on Sales of Some of Corporation's Holdings Is Placed at $461,245.

Net income of the Sterling Securities Corporation for the six months ended on June 30 was $946,225 after all charges and Federal taxes, according to the report published yesterday. Profit included dividends received, aggregating $545,641; interest received at $89,824 and profit on the sale of securities totaling $461,245. The surplus carried forward, after preferred and preference stock dividends was $200,661.

Total assets increased from $35,526,730 to $35,611,944. Net assets, taking securities at market value as of June 30 and deducting depreciation, expenses, taxes and dividends, were $28,702,974. Securities costing $32,351,437 had a market value on June 30 of $25,758,359. The extent to which capital was invested in securities is shown by reduction in cash and call loans from $5,626,004 to $2,889,540 during the period.

THE NCCA ORGANIZATION PLAN

6% Gold Debenture Bonds also Share in profits

FOR guaranteed principal—better than average return and a clean-cut opportunity to share in the rapid expansion of a fast-growing, prospering business, do as more than 12,000 other foresighted men and women of the NCCA family of security holders have done.

With $550 or more invested in A. C. C. C. 6% Gold Debenture Profit Sharing Bonds, many investors are using a thoroughly practical plan for participating in the profitable business of personal finance.

By owning a single security, they not only receive the fine return of $30 per annum for every $550—but in addition participate directly in at least 25% of the earnings.

This is your opportunity to purchase a bond in a Company showing remarkable progress in a profitable field. Few other industries have grown so tremendously and paid such excellent returns in proportion to the investment. If there is one business that can be considered stable and necessary under most conditions, it is the business of dealing in money. Money is the essential commodity of modern civilization, hence a universal need.

THE BUSINESS

American Cash Credit Corporation is one of the group of National Cash Credit Association subsidiaries and was founded in March, 1929, starting with assets of $30,000, which have grown to nearly $2,000,000 in a year's time. It was formed to buy, sell, and deal in securities of banks, insurance companies, personal loan companies and other companies operating in the financial field. Proceeds of bonds are to be used for enlarging portfolio and financing expansion of subsidiary companies. Only one-sixth of possible market in the personal finance field has been tapped thus far, so that largest expansion lies directly ahead. Several tremendously important steps now being organized by the Corporation. Survey shows personal finance loans issued last year exceeded $1,000,000,000. Earnings of the corporation not dependent on business conditions in any particular area.

MEXICAN BONDS RISE ON STOCK EXCHANGE

Sharp Advances, Ranging From 1½ to 2 Points, Follow Signing of Debt Agreement.

RAILS AND UTILITIES FIRM

But the Convertible Issues Show Variations—Industrials Irregular, Government Group Dull.

A sharp rise in Mexican bonds took place yesterday on the Stock Exchange, following the news of the signing of the debt agreement between the Mexican Government and the International Committee of Bankers on Mexico. Although the gains ranged from 1½ to 2 points, they are considered large in view of the fact that these issues rarely show net changes of more than small fractions. Mexican 6s of 1933, small, assented, moved up 2 points, as did the large bonds of the issue. The National Railways of Mexico 4s, assented, both small and large denominations, moved up 1½ points.

The balance of the foreign list did not show much change in the two-hour trading period yesterday. French Government and municipal bonds continued strong. German industrial and utility issues were little changed for the day, and South American loans were slightly irregular.

Leading railroad and utility issues were the firmest of the domestic list, although convertibles showed some variations. In the latter group, American Telephone and Telegraph convertible 4½s moved up 1½ points, while Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe convertible 4½s dropped 2 points.

Industrial bonds presented an irregular front. Colon Oil 6s recovered 2½ points, Keith Corporation 3 points, while Fisk Rubber 8s dropped 3⅞ points.

The turnover was small in United States Government issues, and the net changes were inconsequential. The active issues finished with changes ranging from 1-32 point higher to 3-32 point lower.

WANTED—
Salesmen for Security Wholesaling

This company can use the services of two or more able men experienced in the wholesale distribution of high grade securities.

The proposition to dealers is unusually attractive in that it permits a large volume and lucrative retail distribution. The origination of sound issues is continuous and the present connections are therefore permanent for men with the ability to make good.

This organization is large and substantial, with an unusual history of success. It is aggressive and modern in its support of its wholesale staff. Remuneration is on a commission basis.

If you believe you have the experience we require—if you know you have the competence, sincerity and honesty that will lead to a pleasant and satisfactory relationship, call Mr. Robison at Caledonia 1538, Monday or Tuesday, for an appointment, or you may address Mr. Robison by letter—385 Fifth Avenue, 11th Floor.

Opportune Investment

The Water Works industry is fast becoming an outstanding example of what can be accomplished in economy and improved efficiency through large scale operations, directed by concentrated capital. Consolidation of water works into large groups such as with central control is providing unusual situations for those who would invest opportunely.

For information concerning water works investments and particularly National Water Works Corporation, ask for A-29

dustries a substantial recovery may be expected within a comparatively short time.

The motor industry was perhaps more affected by the present depression than any other of the important industries, it is pointed out. For more than two years prior to the break in the stock market last Fall the Ford Motor Company was not an important competitor, since this company was changing its machinery to bring out an entirely different model. Consequently, in this period virtually all the other companies were undergoing a large expansion program and operating at or near capacity. When the change in business conditions took place last Fall the motor industry as a whole not only faced a decrease in the volume of business but had an additional strong competitor.

Changes by General Motors.

The extent to which the General Motors Corporation was able to meet these changed conditions is shown by the fact that for the first six months of this year the reduction in net operating income was 35.2 per cent, while the loss in dollar volume of output was 30.1 per cent when compared with the corresponding period of 1929. Alfred P. Sloan, president, in commenting recently on the operation of the company in this period, said:

"It is felt that the relation of earnings to volume in comparison with the previous year is a favorable one, as it is a recognized fact that the falling off in volume is normally accompanied by a much greater reduction in profits because of the influence of fixed or uncontrollable expense which must go on to an important degree irrespective of conditions."

Mr. Sloan explained that the comparatively good showing of the corporation for the first six months of this year was made possible because of an early expectation that the change in business conditions might be more formidable and far-reaching than had been generally expected. Consequently, he said, every expense was exhaustively scrutinized with a view of reappraising its value in relation to its cost when measured by the changed circumstances.

Other Similar Problems.

While the problems of some perhaps may not be so great as was the case with General Motors, owing to the fact that they have not expanded so rapidly in the last few years, practically every company is facing a readjustment in one way or another.

Highly competitive conditions exist in the oil industry with the result that it is necessary for an oil company to get all the profits in every branch of the industry, producing, refining, marketing and transportation, in order to face existing conditions with any degree of security, it is said. Through consolidations, realignments of properties, construction of additional crude and gasoline pipe lines this is being accomplished as rapidly as possible. Diminishing profits as a result of overproduction of crude oil and low refinery prices for gasoline are believed to be materially aiding the oil industry in bringing about this readjustment.

The United States Steel Corporation is also taking advantage of present conditions in order to expand its operations. So far this year it has acquired the Columbia Steel Company on the Pacific Coast, the Atlas Portland Cement Company and recently obtained an option to purchase the Oil Well Supply Company. In addition it is building a huge plant at Chicago and improving its facilities at several other points. This expansion program on the part of the steel corporation is most significant at this time, since it did comparatively little in expanding its operations in the "boom" period.

ALONG THE HIGHWAYS OF FINANCE.

Million-Dollar Executives—Mr. Grace's Career—American Capital Abroad and the Guggenheims.

What Is an Executive Worth?

When Eugene G. Grace, president of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, testified that he received a bonus of $1,623,753 in 1929, in addition to a salary of $12,000, he precipitated an acrid discussion in Wall Street. That the disclosure will have far-reaching repercussions is already apparent.

In the first place, the fact that Mr. Grace received such compensation as an operating executive came as something of a shock to many in the financial community. Previous reports that he had received a bonus of $750,000 had been questioned. That figure seemed incredible. It required Mr. Grace's own testimony to convince the skeptics.

For the first time, compensation in industry has reached a level comparable with that attained in the motion picture business. Mr. Grace, it develops, receives as much as such luminaries as Douglas Fairbanks and Charlie Chaplin. This comparison could not be avoided.

Mr. Schwab's Idea.

The bonus system of Bethlehem, it appears, was originated by Chairman Charles M. Schwab, who is not a participant. Mr. Schwab, as is well known, believes in liberal compensation for executives as well as for the rank and file of workers. He chose Mr. Grace as the man to whose shoulders he wished to shift some of the burdens of his office as the ranking head of Bethlehem. The details of the bonus plan were not withheld from Bethlehem stockholders, as has been suggested. On the contrary, as long ago as 1918 the company, in its report for 1917, announced:

"The bonus system approved at the last annual meeting of stockholders has been continued with most satisfactory results in all departments of the organization. The total bonus payments for the year 1917 to the officers of your corporation and heads of departments having general control of matters affecting your corporation and subsidiaries as a whole was $3,913,833.50, and the percentage of such total to the total net earnings of your corporation, after deducting all interest charges and providing for all taxes, but before deducting depreciation, was 7.96 per cent."

It is recalled also that Mr. Schwab has made several references to the "million-dollar" president of Bethlehem. This disposes of the implication that stockholders have been kept in the dark as to the size of the bonus distribution. The fact that Wall Street overlooked the previous disclosures is indicated by the surprise with which Mr. Grace's testimony last week was greeted.

What Mr. Rockefeller Said.

In the same connection somebody dug up the remarks of John D. Rockefeller respecting the size of the late Elbert H. Gary's salary as chairman of the United States Steel Corporation. It seems that during the Federal Government's unsuccessful effort to dissolve the Steel Corporation as a monopoly in restraint of trade Mr. Rockefeller was asked whether, in his opinion, the $100,000 annual salary reported to have been paid to Judge Gary was exorbitant. "You may think so," Mr. Rockefeller is said to have replied, "but if United States Steel would like to dispense with Mr. Gary's services, I stand ready to make him an offer of $1,000,000 a year to work for Standard Oil." That statement, coming from Mr. Rockefeller, who has not been a conspicuous exponent of exorbitant salaries, was flattering to Judge Gary, to say the least.

Standard Oil, of course, never had the opportunity to employ Judge Gary, who remained as the chief executive officer of the Steel Corporation until he died. But he never received from that corporation anything like the $1,000,000 which Mr. Rockefeller was so ready to have Standard Oil pay him. As a matter of fact, Judge Gary's total compensation, including salary and bonus, was not much more than $500,000 in the most prosperous years of United States Steel, it is understood.

Identifying Mr. Grace.

The disclosures respecting Mr. Grace's princely income caused a thumbing of the biographical records by persons who wished to learn more about him. It was found that this quiet suave man, with something of a professorial flavor, has spent all of his business life with the company he now heads. He was born in Goshen, N. J., on Aug. 27, 1876. Educated at Pennington Seminary and Lehigh University, he joined the Bethlehem Steel Company on June 29, 1899. That was in the same year that he was graduated at Lehigh after having received the Wilbur scholarship prize. He had finished as first honor man. His first job with Bethlehem was in the electrical department. In 1902 he was appointed superintendent of yards, in 1906 he was advanced to assistant to the general superintendent and in the same year he was made general superintendent. In October, 1908, he was elected a director and made general manager of the company, later becoming president. His association with Mr. Schwab dates back about twenty-five years.

Preferring Slow Execution.

An artless bit of market pessimism was revealed in an order received by a commission house recently from a customer who was spending a vacation in New Zealand. He sent by mail an order to buy 100 shares of United States Steel at the market. Accompanying the order was the comment that he had thought of cabling his brokers, but concluded that if he sent his instruction by mails he probably would get a better price.

Consistent Dividend-Payers.

A statistician took the trouble last week to list some of the companies with the most consistent dividend-paying records. It was found that the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey had been paying uninterruptedly for forty-two years, the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company for forty-six years, the Western Union Telegraph Company for fifty-seven years, United Fruit thirty-one years, General Electric twenty-eight years, Westinghouse Air Brake thirty-five years, National Biscuit thirty-one years, Burroughs Adding Machine thirty-five years, United Gas Improvement forty-five years, American Telephone and Telegraph forty-eight years, Consolidated Gas thirty-eight years, Pennsylvania Railroad seventy-five years and New York Central sixty-one years.

American Capital Abroad.

American capital is being employed heavily in the development of mining properties in South Africa, Australia and elswhere. Announcement last week that the American Smelting and Refining Company had acquired a large interest in Mining Trust, Ltd., and that it would provide the funds needed to expand the operations at Mount Isa, Australia, served to emphasize a movement which has been gathering momentum for years. American Smelting will put several million dollars into the Mount Isa properties, said to be among the richest in the world potentially. What is happening in Australia is only an incident as compared with the American wealth that is being poured into South African mining properties. It is estimated that the Newmont Mining Company owns close to 1,000,000 shares of South African mining stocks, while the American Metal Company, Ltd., holds several hundred thousand shares in companies operating there. Many hundreds of thousands more shares are owned by other American interests.

A Mining Potentate.

There is a fascinating story back of American Smelting's investment in Mining Trust, Ltd. It concerns one Leslie Urquhart, an imposing figure who came to New York several months ago with a plan to interest American capital in his projects. So far as Mount Isa was concerned, he had control of the properties, but needed money to bring out the great wealth which was known to be tucked away in them. In New York Urquhart talked over his plans with various financiers, meeting with discouragement here and there. It remained, however, for the Guggenheim-controlled American Smelting to realize the opportunities that existed and it was this company which, after exhaustive studies by its experts, provided the funds that were required. The Mount Isa mines are expected to begin producing next month. Urquhart's company, Mining Trust, Ltd., as a result of its interest in Mount Isa, will profit enormously, it is predicted. The Mount Isa properties are said to be rich in silver, zinc and lead.

The Alert Guggenheims.

With the extension of American Smelting's interests into Australia, the Guggenheim interests have again demonstrated that they are world-minded, to a greater extent possibly than any other American group. Only a few weeks ago it was announced that the Guggenheims had become the most important partners of the Chilean Government in the $375,000,000 nitrate combine. The Guggenheims control about 35 per cent of Chile's nitrate business. Their interests there, however, represent a small part of their far-flung industrial empire. The company has vast interests in Mexico, Africa, South America and in Europe.

hold the stocks so awarded for a period not to exceed five years, subject to forfeiture in case the beneficiary voluntarily quits the service of the corporation or its subsidiary or is discharged for good cause, of which the committee shall be the judges.

Although figures as to the sums paid to individual officials of the Steel Corporation are not available, it is known that they have never approached in size the bonuses paid to Mr. Grace of Bethlehem or that company's principal vice presidents. It is generally understood that the late Elbert H. Gary, who was the Steel Corporation's highest-paid official, received in salary and bonus a total of about $500,000 in the corporation's more prosperous years. Judge Gary was chairman and chief executive officer.

General Motors Methods.

Under the bonus plan of the General Motors Corporation a percentage of the net earnings, after deducting 7 per cent on the capital invested in the business, is turned over to a special bonus fund. Since 1923 the amount set aside has been 5 per cent. This fund is invested in common stock of the corporation.

At the end of each year the stock is awarded to employes on the basis of the degree to which their services individually have contributed to the success of the corporation. One-fourth of the award is paid at the time the award is made and the rest in three annual instalments. Last year there were 2,840 awards made for a total of 167,378 shares. The highest number of shares ever awarded under the present plan was in 1926, when 428,170 shares were distributed on 1,513 awards.

The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey has a bonus arrangement, from which Walter C. Teagle, president, specifically exempted himself, but which it is understood yielded to the directors who are active operating officials an average of about $60,000 apiece in 1929.

funds. The new type will do away with this clause, it is said, and provide no necessity for making such returns to stockholders immediately.

Popularity of Fixed Trust.

The great popularity of the fixed trust, it is said in some quarters, is because its shares never sell at prices far below the market value of their underlying securities, as is now quite common for investment trust stocks. The market price is maintained by an offer to exchange the shares of fixed trust for cash at a price at or only a small per cent below the liquidating value at any time, a feature embodied in the plans of virtually all fixed trusts, and expected to be included in the forthcoming type.

Another reason for fixed trust favoritism, especially among small investors, it is pointed out, is that their shares sell at low prices, at $8, $10 or $12. The sponsors of the new development of "fixed-management" trust are also expected to make similar marketing arrangements.

Wall Street is anxious to see how well this hybrid in trust development will take with the public, and it has been intimated that it might mark a far-reaching change in investment trust theory.

The Investor's Safeguard—
More Information on Specific Companies

INSTEAD of asking "What do you think of the Market?" or "When is the Market going up?", it would profit each investor more to study the present financial position, the management, the earnings record and the prospects of particular companies, in which he owns or contemplates buying securities. The Market of 1929, (prior to the October-November break), is generally regarded as a spectacular bull market, yet there were hundreds of securities that were lower on September 15th, 1929, than on January 1st, 1929. If the above named factors affecting a company's securities are known to be satisfactory, then the minor market swings in either direction may be ignored. Success in business or investing is no accident—its basic foundation is proper use of facts. Hence the advantage of securing each day the latest earnings reports and analyses, the news of business and corporate developments affecting and revealing values and probable price movements, first-hand through an acknowledged financial authority—THE WALL STREET JOURNAL. Will the June Lows be broken?

STOCKS have rallied halfway back from the June lows to the May highs.

Is the Bear Market definitely over, or has the rally carried as far as may, under the circumstances, reasonably be expected?

Many brokers and financial observers have recently become highly optimistic. They assert that business will soon begin to reveal definite evidences of an early improvement—and that the Market should now begin to discount the approaching industrial revival.

Other commentators are not quite so cocksure. They state that the Market has enjoyed about all the rally to which it is entitled—that business will not pick up quickly and substantially—that the June lows will again be severely tested by the professional bears.

If there is a probability that the June lows in many securities will be pierced, then it would appear wise to sell all securities not held outright for the long pull.

Our estimate of the current and prospective market situation is outlined in current Bulletins, copies of which will be sent to you free of charge upon request. Simply address

CHANGE FOR HOWEY MINES

Board Headed by R. T. Birks Elected—Development Planned for Sapawe Lake Field.

Special to The New York Times.

TORONTO, July 26.—A new board of directors, composed of R. T. Birks, president; W. S. Cherry, vice president; R. Home Smith, J. A. Northway and André Dorfman, directors, has been elected for Howey Gold Mines, Ltd., following the resignation of J. E. Hammell, president, and Harry Oakes and Albert Wende, directors. An official statement says:

"The election of a new board means that the Cherry interests have secured the cooperation of the Huronian Mining and Finance Company, Ltd., to assist in working out a definite program for the future development of the property. The new board will supervise all operations for two or three months, at the end of which time they will be in a position to lay a definite plan before the shareholders. In the meantime the Cherry interests have kindly consented to postpone all payments due under their loan until the shareholders' meeting, about Oct. 1."

A report from Stewart, B. C., says a shipment of 250 tons of ore was sent early this month from the Porter (Idaho) mine to the smelter at Tacoma. This is the first shipment made from the Porter since the property was taken over by Premier Gold. It is understood the ore was taken out in preparing stopes for regular mining.

Dome Mines Profits Lower.

Dome Mines, Ltd., reports for the first six months of the year a net profit of $48,923 after having shown for the first quarter one of $89,687. Most of the shrinkage was due to an increase in the operating loss. For the first quarter this stood at $1,479, and for the half year at $117,852.

Activity is on the increase in the Sapawe Lake gold field west of Fort William. The first commercial airplane to visit the area arrived this week with a party of Eastern mining men headed by Tom Montgomery, one of the original stakers of the Waite-Ackerman-Montgomery in Rouyn Field. The Sapawe Lake properties of Mr. Montgomery and his associates are being inspected with a view to outlining a development program. Other prominent companies have men in the field. Two representatives of the Homestake Mining Company are examining properties there, and the Norris & Tower interests are looking at properties. It is reported from the field that Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting is sending engineers into Sapawe Lake this week.

Financing for Abana Mines.

Under the new arrangements between Abana Mines, Ltd., and the Mining Corporation of Canada, Ltd., the latter company will provide Abana with $50,000 for the purpose of retiring its indebtedness to the original vendors of the property and give Abana an unencumbered property. In addition to the financial assistance granted, Mining Corporation will assume control of Abana in so far as its engineers will be responsible for the working program and for bringing the mine into production. Abana, however, is under a further obligation to raise $200,000.

A total of 9,798 tons of ore was received at the Trail Smelter for the week ended on July 21. Of this total, 9,659 tons were from the company's own mines and 139 from custom mines, the individual shipments being sixty-one tons from the Bell Mine, fifty-eight from the Midnight and forty-five from the Republic.

Canada produced 9,204 short tons of zinc in June, the same as in May, and for the first six months 57,212 tons, or 114,404,000 pounds.

Treating upward of 635,000 tons of ore in the first six months of 1930 and producing some $8,361,760, the gold mines of the Kirkland Lake district established a new high record. The ore carried an average of well above $14 a ton, from which about $13.17 a ton was recovered. In June $1,552,921 was produced from 99,868 tons of ore. The average grade of the ore was around $16.60 to the ton and the average recovery $15.65. Lake Shore accounted to a large extent for the high June average, because this is the month of the annual clean-up. Teck Hughes also entered into a period of higher average rate of recovery.

NEW ENGLAND STOCKS LOW.

Some Manufacturers Report Rush Orders to Replenish Shelves.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, July 25.—Some New England manufacturers have lately received rush orders for goods, due, they report, to the fact that consumers have allowed inventories to fall too low. Although general business activity in this section continues distinctly subnormal, a better feeling is noted in regard to the probable course of trade during the coming months.

Car loadings on the New England railroads are below the average of the first half year, but railroad executives think that the freight movement will increase soon.

New building contracts for the week ended July 22 were above the average of previous weeks this year and substantially up to the average of the corresponding weeks of other recent years.

Sales of jewelry at wholesale so far in 1930 have been 15 per cent below those of last year. Department store and specialty shop sales continue low. Jobbers of dry goods report no material increase in sales. Quietness prevails in suit and cloak lines and men's clothing. Manufacturers of women's novelty shoes report some increase in production.

PHILADELPHIA LOOKS TO FALL.

Much Public Construction Is Expected to Start Revival.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Pa., July 25.—Though business shows no signs of an upturn in August, September is likely to inaugurate a season of activity. The municipality will then contract for a new bridge across the Schuylkill at Market Street and will provide for a four-track subway link in West Philadelphia.

Work on the convention hall will be fully under way and the Board of Education will push for construction of its new headquarters.

Plans are shaping up for the airport at Hog Island and, coupled with private operations, these public projects assure active construction for late months of this year.

Peace in the anthracite regions, which appears to be reasonably assured for over five years, will do much to stabilize employment for 150,000 mine workers and also will aid all distributers supplying the hard coal section.

Allowing for lower prices, business payments here compare favorably with those of a year ago. Distribution assumes a larger volume than in recent months during which stocks were being depleted. As soon as prices of raw materials become more stable there will be additional incentive for buying manufactured goods.

Department store trade varies, but July business as a whole will compare favorably with that of two years ago. Plants working on children's dresses are doing a larger business than a year ago.

The Reserve Bank notes that, in June, instalment houses sustained a considerable drop in sales, due evidently to the unemployment then prevailing.

RICHMOND BUILDING GAINS.

Large Contracts Awarded—Heat Affects Business.

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, July 25.—Wholesale trade in this district in June was lower than in May or June, 1929. Stocks on the shelves of reporting firms decreased in all lines except shoes. Collections were slower in every line, but there is more complaining among wholesalers.

The heat affected business adversely, as shown by bank clearings in the district. Crops have been damaged, but not to the danger point.

A decided improvement is seen in construction work, with a number of large contracts awarded. An improvement in rayon is reported, but paper mills and railroad shops continue on curtailed time. The most serious blow to employment is the garment workers' strike in Baltimore, affecting 3,000.

GEORGIA INVESTING FUNDS.

Real Estate Market Favored Under Present Business Conditions.

Special to The New York Times.

ATLANTA, Ga., July 25.—The latter half of July in the Atlanta property market has given evidence of continued volume of investments, although the uncertainty that has accompanied the general business depression has not cleared.

Heavy investments by local capitalists such as the Candlers have aided substantially to maintain the real estate market. Real estate men specializing in the residential field say that desirable homes are fast being removed from the market, with a curtailment of new building. Daily transfers in homes have shown a ratio of about five to one to building permits.

A price of 25 cents a pound was brought by the first bale of Georgia cotton to be sold, according to dispatches from Savannah. The bale, which was of middling grade with a good staple, was auctioned off by the superintendent of the Savannah Cotton Exchange and purchased for the account of the Exchange by President Joseph Doolan. The cotton, grown in Early County, was considered of good grade and weighed about 700 pounds for the bale.

CHICAGO REVIVAL APPEARS.

Depleted Stocks Cause Buying—Plants Add Workers.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, July 25.—Chicago straws pointing to an early and genuine upturn in local activity are more numerous. A local brick company is reopening one of its plants because of depleted stock. Word has been given to one large retail staff of buyers to order more freely for Fall stocks, while current store inventories are so low in some lines that small fill-in orders are necessary. A nationally known furniture company has added substantially to its payroll and is stepping up production.

Wholesale dry goods activities are about 10 per cent less than a year ago. Retail trade is largely of the bargain-hunting type, with clearance sales of warm-weather goods meeting a good response.

Extensions and improvements authorized in the recent traction ordinance are expected to stimulate business construction, but residential building shows no signs of an upturn.

OPTIMISTIC AT ST. LOUIS.

But Wholesale and Retail Trade Shows No Improvement.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, July 25.—There is distinctly more optimism in this district, but large department stores report a decrease in sales, as compared with last year, and this is true of the retailers.

Lack of rainfall, with the intensely hot weather, has seriously injured crops.

Industries are operating part time or are closed, though plants making electrical supplies are fairly busy.

An improvement is noted in the shoe industry, but sales are considerably below last year.

Automobile sales continue to lag, but there is a good demand for tires and accessories, due chiefly to the heavy tourist traffic.

Employment is still considerably below normal. Efforts to stimulate passenger traffic by low rail rates have been fairly successful.

A little improvement is reported in building, but the volume is still considerably below normal.

KANSAS CITY CLEARINGS FALL.

Gold Reserves of Federal Bank Gain $2,000,000.

Special to The New York Times.

KANSAS CITY, July 25.—Gold reserves of the Kansas City Federal Reserve Bank increased about $2,000,000 in the past week and member banks reserve account increased $11,500,000. Other changes were small. Bills discounted, bills bought in the open market and note circulation each decreased about $250,000.

Total clearings through the bank for the week were $225,000,000, a decrease of $1,000,000 from the preceding week and $38,500,000 less than a year ago.

BUSINESS SMALLER IN WEST.

Volume of Building Continues to Gain on Last Year.

Special to The New York Times.

MINNEAPOLIS, July 25.—Business in this district during the first half of July is reported by the Reserve Bank lower than in June due to the smaller grain marketing movement.

Debits to individual accounts at seventeen cities were 17 per cent smaller than in the same weeks of 1929.

The country check clearings for the first half of July were 15 per cent smaller than last year. On the other hand the volume of building contracts continued larger than in the corresponding period of 1929.

Crops will be larger than a year ago if no further adverse factors develop before the harvest. Two periods of hot, dry weather have damaged the crops to some extent since the government forecast.

City banks which make weekly reports to the Reserve Bank report deposits 1 per cent larger than a year ago and are out of debt to the Reserve Bank, whereas a year ago they were borrowing $12,000,000.

SLIGHT GAIN IN SOUTHWEST.

Dallas Reports Higher Bank Clearings and More Building.

Special to The New York Times.

DALLAS, Texas, July 25.—Business throughout the Eleventh Federal Reserve District shows some improvement for the week, although both retail and wholesale sales still are below the level for the same period last year. Sentiment among merchants, bankers and business men generally is that the low tide of depression has been reached and that there will be a slow but steady movement toward better conditions by Fall. Already it is believed that there is an improvement in the Southwest.

Stocks of merchandise are lower than in many years. Retailers have been buying only sufficient goods to meet demands, a situation favorable for buying on the price decline.

Building operations show an increase for the week. Another twenty-five-story $2,000,000 skyscraper was announced for Dallas. Residence building throughout the Southwest shows an increase.

Bank clearings show a rise, which is taken to reflect improving business and increased retail sales. Bank debits also increased for the week, but are less than the debits for this time last year.

WEST COAST TRADE MIXED.

Store and Crop Returns Small—Bonds Favored on the Exchanges.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, July 25.—Mixed earnings and sales reports and a confusing assortment of optimism and pessimism continue to veil business conditions in Pacific Coast centres.

Further slashes in dividends and indications that leading stores will show smaller returns for the first six months do not help matters, but several authorities contend that early improvement is certain and that Sept. 1 should find a distinct upward trend in general business.

The Pacific Northwest is generally quiet, with lumber mills operating far below capacity and the fruit crops too heavy for the markets.

Bond men are encouraged by rapid sale of California Packing Corporation debentures, which were largely held locally, as well as those of a coast utility company and one or two other issues. There is very little trading in common stock on Western exchanges and investment bankers are predicting that the public will turn definitely to bonds this Autumn.

DROUGHT EXTENDS CORN'S HIGH MARKS

Forecast Promises No Rain, Speculation Broadens and Prices Gain 1½ to 2⅛c.

WHEAT IRREGULAR AT END

Oats Are Held Firm by Strength in Other Grains—Rye Rises in Light Trading.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, July 26.—No hope of a break in the dry and hot weather over the corn belt is held out by the forecast for the coming week, and with a general broadening in the speculative interest prices advanced today to new highs on the present movement on all deliveries. The close was at net gains of 1½ to 2⅛ cents, the new crop months leading. The bulge was checked by selling against daily and weekly offers, some of the latter showing a profit of around 5 cents a bushel.

Houses with Eastern connections have taken the buying side, presumably in an effort to help wheat, but pit brokers said that general trade in the market today was the best so far. Dry and hot weather was reported again over most of the belt, with the exception of rains in parts of Iowa.

Kansas City led the rise, with December up 2⅞ cents in the face of the recent rains in Kansas. Most of the trade in futures is in the December delivery. Buying and selling orders in other months caused sharp prices changes.

The East bought 135,000 bushels for the day, while the country sold 115,000 bushels to arrive.

Sentiment remains bullish and higher prices are expected unless good rain falls. The bluge of 16¼ cents in the December since July 8, though, has weakened the technical position, and a majority of commission houses are inclined to advise caution on the buying side on bulges.

Primary receipts of corn were 925,000 bushels; a week ago 617,000 and a year ago 699,000. Shipments respectively were 262,000, 501,000 and 524,000 bushels.

The wheat market was heavy in undertone, and while a strong rally at one time resulted from the strength in corn, the bulge failed to hold. Final trades were ⅝ cent higher to ⅛ cent lower, the former on July. Hedging sales were fairly liberal, while the seaboard bought. Trade in the aggergate was not large.

Foreign demand for cash wheat continues active, with sales of around 1,000,000 bushels in all positions. The Gulf basis was firmer on hard Winter, with first half of September reported sold at 7¼ cents over the Chicago September. Indications are for large receipts of wheat here Monday, and the trade looks for a big increase in the domestic visible supply.

Foreign wheat markets were strong, with Liverpool ½ to 1d higher because of hot weather in Germany and the sale of a cargo of Australian grain to India. Winnipeg was off ⅝ to ¾ cent for the day, with beneficial rains reported in parts of the prairie Provinces.

Primary receipts of wheat were 4,356,000 bushels, a week ago 4,553,000 and a year ago 4,959,000. Shipments respectively were 2,353,000, 1,774,000 and 2,273,000 bushels.

Strength in other grains was largely responsible for firmness in oats, with the finish ¼ cent lower to ½ cent higher, commission houses being the buyers.

Rye was 1¼ to 1½ cents higher with wheat, but trade was light.

Prices for the principal grains were as follows:

LACK OF RAIN LIFTS COTTON $1 A BALE

Opening Advance Is Held to Finish, With Supply of Contracts Limited.

BIG DAMAGE IN OKLAHOMA

General Soaking of Soil Is Needed in Large Area to Halt Deterioration.

Prices on the Cotton Exchange were advanced $1 a bale yesterday by short covering inspired by the limited relief afforded drought sections in the unsettled weather of the last week. With increasing evidence that conditions favorable for moisture were passing without bringing a radical improvement, selling pressure was lifted and buyers found the supply of contracts rather limited. After opening at an advance, the market displayed resistance throughout and ended 18 to 21 points higher than on Friday and about a half cent lower than at the close a week ago.

While sufficient moisture to benefit vegetation was received during the week at about a third of the reporting stations in Tennessee, Mississippi and Arkansas for the first time in more than two months, almost no relief developed in Texas and Oklahoma, where temperatures as high as 105 to 108 degrees were recorded. According to Wednesday's weekly report, all crops in Oklahoma have been more or less injured by heat and drought, and the Weather Bureau forecast for this week was for generally hot weather, with only scattered thunder showers indicated.

Though both Texas and Oklahoma produced short crops last year, rainfall in July, 1929, in both States averaged between three and four times as much moisture as has been received so far this month. Reports indicate that a general soaking rain is needed from Alabama to the western edge of the cotton States to halt deterioration.

The first official estimate of the 1930 crop will be issued by the Department of Agriculture on Aug. 8, based on conditions prevailing on Aug. 1.

Washington estimated last year's crop at 15,543,000 bales, but this promise was reduced almost 1,000,000 by drought in the West and weevil damage in the East. A Memphis crop reporting agency which came close to the government estimates last year, as well as to the final harvest, placed the indicated yield early this month at slightly less than 14,500,000 and about 1,000,000 bales less than the July estimate last year. Several private crop estimates are expected this week.

SHIP LINES FEATURE CARE FOR CHILDREN

Number of Juvenile Travelers at Sea Increases Yearly, According to Agents.

SHIP MOTHERS' PROVIDED

Toys and Playrooms Plentiful—White Star Carried 10,627 Youngsters in Year.

The volume of traffic of children across the Atlantic has been increased greatly by reason of the service which has been established by the ship lines for the care of youngsters unaccompanied by their parents. The International Mercantile Marine Company, agents of the White Star, Red Star and Atlantic Transport lines operating between New York and European ports, estimates that 90 per cent of its junior travelers are accompanied by parents or guardians, but finds the number of unaccompanied children growing larger each year.

The White Star fleet carried 10,627 children last year in the American, Canadian and Australian services, and the transatlantic service to New York carried 7,427, of whom 531 were infants, according to the Ocean Ferry, spokesman of the I. M. M.

"A mother naturally will hesitate at first," it says, "to let a precious youngster go alone on a 3,000-mile voyage. But the reluctance, normal though it be, is not well founded, for the facilities for the care of the child aboard ship are often better than some parents are able to bestow upon children in the home.

Cling to "Ship Mothers."

"The stewardess with whom the children are intrusted is, in many cases, a mother herself, and all are selected because of their particular experience in child welfare. It is a touching sight to see a little one clinging to her 'ship mother' at the end of a voyage when relatives come to take her away. It is a manifestation of the child's trust and its display of affection for one who has been kindly. The so-called 'stranger' of the first day at sea is the youngster's devoted friend at the end of the ocean journey.

"One striking instance of the excellent care of children at sea was the safe conduct of the 4-month-old O'Brien twins from Boston to Liverpool last year on the Cedric. In a room to themselves, the babies were constantly attended by Mrs. Mann, a special stewardess. They were sprightly on arrival, thriving on the regular daily feedings of specially prepared milk hermetically sealed in the ship's refrigerator."

The ships of the International Mercantile Marine found that children headed for the United States were in the majority last year. Ships of the Liverpool and Southampton service to New York carried 4,285 children and 282 infants, while the eastbound ships carried 2,610 and 249 infants. The largest number were carried in third class, followed by tourist, second and first class in the order named.

Problem Developed in 15 Years.

The problem of caring for children became more serious in the last fifteen years when foreign travel became popular. Many years ago, immigrants who thronged to the United States with their children were satisfied with accommodations of any sort and were concerned only with safe arrival on the shores of the United States, while wealthy families who took their children to sea were able to give them the same care as they had on shore, merely by booking passage for their nursemaids.

The middle-class families have become an important source of income to the ship lines in recent years. The parents seldom are able to carry nurses or devote to the children the time they need if the trip is to have an element of pleasure. The result has been the development of extensive accommodations for the children on modern ships. The White Star Line explains its efforts in this field as follows:

"The novelty of an ocean voyage which provides much diversion for adults is not sufficient for the youngsters. They must be amused in ways in keeping with their years and to meet this condition the company has equipped its vessels with playrooms attractively furnished with toys and objects of amusement more than sufficient for the diversion of the young voyagers.

"There are six playrooms for children of the cabin class; seven for tourist and nine for third class. Steamships of the company have a total of twenty-three playrooms."

SETS RECORD TO BERMUDA.

Liner Pan-America Makes Trip From New York in 36 Hours, 57 Minutes.

The Munson liner Pan-America set a record of 36 hours and 57 minutes for the New York-Bermuda trip last week, improving the mark of 37 hours which was set last Spring by the American Legion, also of the Munson Line. The ship was recently refitted and decorated and additional passenger accommodations installed in preparation for a new weekly service which she will maintain on the Bermuda run.

Effective Aug. 4 the Pan-America will sail from New York every Monday, arrive in Bermuda Wednesday and start back Friday, docking in New York Sunday. This service will be in addition to the calls at Bermuda made every two weeks by the Munson liners operating in the New York-South America service. The Pan-America will go directly to the steamship dock at Hamilton, Bermuda, instead of anchoring in the harbor, when the new service begins.

K. OF C. PILGRIMAGE AUG. 23

Pope to Receive American Party on Way to Oberammergau.

A group of Knights of Columbus and their families from various parts of the country will sail Aug. 23 on the Cunard liner Laconia on a pilgrimage to Oberammergau and Rome. They expect to visit other places on the Continent and Great Britain. They will be welcomed abroad by Anton Lang, who attained world-wide fame in the Christus rôle in the Passion Play and will have an audience with the Pope.

The trip will follow the national convention of the Knights of Columbus in Boston the week of Aug. 18. The party will visit the bathing pavilion at the River Tiber and other recreational centres which are maintained in Rome by the Knights of Columbus.

MAYOR TO LAUNCH VESSEL.

Will Send the Welfare, New Municipal Steamer, Down Ways.

Officials of the Department of Plant and Structures announced yesterday that the new municipal steamer Welfare would be launched from the yard of the John W. Sullivan Shipbuilding Corporation at Elizabethport, N. J. Mayor Walker will launch the boat for the city, and Miss Edna Helen Murphy of 1,895 Grand Concourse, the Bronx, will act as sponsor.

The Welfare, the eighth vessel added to the municipal fleet during the term of Commissioner Albert Goldman, will ply between Eighty-sixth Street, Manhattan, and Welfare Island, and will be used for the transportation of passengers, patients and baggage. It is 106 feet long and has an operating draft of 9½ feet.

"NOWHERE" CRUISE STARTS

16,330 Bottles of Liquor Carried by the California.

The Anchor liner California, the first of the so-called "nowhere cruise" vessels, sailed yesterday for Halifax with 719 passengers. The series of Summer cruises, designed for passengers not having time to go to Europe, were originally planned without ports of call, but later it was decided to route the vessels to a foreign port.

Tomorrow the California will leave Halifax and roam around the Atlantic for a few days, going where the weather is most propitious. A great deal of interest has been evinced in shipping circles on the plan to carry a liquor supply for passengers, and officials of the tour company admitted that 16,330 bottles of liquor were on board. These included 2,540 bottles of wine, 1,600 bottles of whisky and the remainder in cordials and beer.

The weather has remained generally fair during the last twenty-four hours, except for local showers and thunderstorms in the lake region, the upper Mississippi and upper Ohio Valleys and portions of Georgia, Alabama and Florida. The temperature continued abnormally high over most sections east of the Rocky Mountains, and maximums of 100 degrees or slightly higher were registered this afternoon at numerous stations in the Plains States, the great central valley, the northern portion of the West Gulf States and the interior of the Middle Atlantic States, the highest reported being 106 degrees at Huron, S. The previous record for temperatures of 100 degrees or more in any one year at Washington was four days in 1874.

HOLDING PRICE LINES CRITICIZED BY HAHN

Asserts That Many Retailers Try to Fix Status by Prices Instead of Patrons.

MUST RELOCATE CONSUMER

Stores Must Adjust Values in Time of Depression—Brand Issue Up to Producers.

The declared policy of certain manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers of maintaining price lines, with the assertion that they are improving the quality of the merchandise and that the consumer will obtain more value for his money, was roundly scored by Lew Hahn, president of Hahn's Department Stores, in an interview with THE TIMES yesterday. With reduced incomes, widespread unemployment and an increasing demand for lower price levels, the only way buyers can be assured that they are receiving value is to obtain merchandise at cheaper prices, Mr. Hahn declared.

"Some say that this policy of reducing prices is 'trading down,'" Mr. Hahn stated, "but I think that such an assertion is the result of loose business thinking. Numerous stores attempt to fix their place in a community by their price range instead of the class of people to which they cater. If a department store wishes to maintain its position in a community, it must go up and down with the type of people it serves.

Fitting Values to Consumer.

"If we operate a store, selling men's suits at $100, we must continue that price just so long as our customers are willing and able to pay the price. But in times like the present, when incomes have been reduced materially, it is not clever to continue retailing suits for $100. Our job is to sell to those particular people and, if circumstances have made it advisable for them to pay only $65 or $75 for a suit of clothes, then we must revise our lines to meet the demand. It is not up to us to do as we think, but as our customers wish.

"One of the problems, under existing conditions, that retailers must solve is to discover where the consumer is. A period of stable conditions should teach us something. Any department store or other retailing factor should capitalize on the lessons learned during prosperous times. If in one season we sell 500 coats at $300 each, we naturally anticipate doing an equal or greater volume of business during the following season, provided conditions are the same. When prosperity is broken, however, and incomes are reduced, the consumer abruptly disappears from his previous purchasing level. Then it is up to us to discover at what price we can attract him or her again. When this is definitely determined we will be able to do business, even if on a lower price plane. I am amused by manufacturers and wholesalers who tell the retailers that they should reduce prices. There is no question about it. We have to."

Stresses Management.

The same problems are being faced by both department stores and individual retailers, Mr. Hahn declared, and depressed conditions must be met with good management. He cited the merger of twenty-six stores into his own company as an example, and stated that when these stores were taken over inventories totaled about $30,000,000. An immediate move to clean up stock was undertaken, with the result that these stores entered the current year with stocks valued at but $20,000,000. During prosperous times management usually relaxes, Mr. Hahn said, with the result that stocks grow out of shape. Many stores entered the present depression in this condition, he said, with the result that they suffered extremely.

"There has been quite a lot of discussion about private brands replacing national ones," Mr. Hahn observed. "Many national brands are exceedingly reliable products, made known through advertising and the cooperation of retailers. I believe that as long as manufacturers play fairly with the retailer on quality and price the merchant would be foolish to discard these goods.

"There is, however, a tendency among some manufacturers to attempt to control the retailer and to fix prices. If this develops further it will serve to embarrass retailers, and under these circumstances he cannot be blamed if he prefers to push his own brands. There is no patent or copyright on quality. The retailer is as important in his own community as the national manufacturer. There is no reason why such a merchant cannot take a satisfactory article and sell it under his own brand, if the national manufacturer by pursuing a policy of arrogance drives him to it."

SALESMEN MORE IN DEMAND

Travelers Needed Because Buyers Make Fewer Visits to Markets.

A steady increase in the demand for salesmen to cover territory in all parts of the country has developed during the last two months, William G. Adams, managing director of the National Council of Traveling Salesmen's Associations, reported yesterday. The additional salesmen, he said, are needed because retail stores are now curtailing expenses and the average buyer now makes only one-third or one-half the number of trips to merchandise centres that were formerly made.

"The demand for salesmen is most apparent in ready-to-wear lines, although all divisions catering to retail establishments have been affected," Mr. Adams continued. "The number of salesmen needed will increase steadily as the Fall buying season gets under way. Those now on the road report that they are getting orders for larger quantities because of the infrequency with which buyers now reach the markets."

To Discuss Salesmen's Dinner.

A committee of traveling salesmen headed by Arthur J. Lewy, chairman of the ways and means committee of the National Council of Traveling Salesmen's Associations, will meet at the Hotel Pennsylvania Tuesday, to discuss plans for a dinner for salesmen to be held some time in August. According to Mr. Lewy, traveling men representing all lines of trade will be invited to attend the dinner, which will be followed by a discussion of business prospects for the Fall.

The Merchant's Point of View

RECORD hot weather and the number of persons away on vacation did not help retail sales last week and depressed the level of trade still further. Here and there, however, despite adverse conditions, there were instances reported where special values appeared to have attracted consumer interest. It is considered quite likely that price reductions will soon exert their usual influence and increase trade totals when shopping becomes more comfortable and needs more pressing.

While real improvement must wait upon general business recovery with reduced unemployment and elimination of the fear of losing positions or suffering wage cuts, there seems to be more than a little basis for the theory that the public is also holding back on its purchases because of its desire to benefit through lower prices. The general situation is by no means as "psychological" as many would have it—there are too many without a means of livelihood to accept that rather common label—but it is true to a degree that buying is being held up all along the line until goods come down to their proper levels.

It is enough for the retailer to figure out how he is operating himself in order to get a pretty fair idea just now of what many consumers are thinking.

From all present indications, real volume business for Fall in the wholesale merchandise markets will be from two weeks to a month late this year. In addition to the delay, it is likely that operations of the retailers will be considerably restricted in their initial purchasing, so that thorough tests may be carried out on the prices, qualities and styles which will find most favor with the public next season.

Building Contracts Down. Only further evidences of Summer slackening were to be observed during the week-end and, since the reaction already in progress represented a major decline, the slowing down naturally brings business to new low levels not found since the post-war collapse.

In the recent outflow of gold another unfavorable factor has developed, since it means a narrowing of the credit base at a time when there is still very urgent need of promoting easier money rates throughout the country and thawing out some of the bank loans made on collateral.

The slump in wholesale commodity prices continued last week with another drop of a point this time in the Annalist weekly index. The figure dropped to 122 as against 150.4 a year ago. Six of the commodity groups were off, the one increase was in fuels, and building materials were unchanged.

Despite the recent stability in building material prices, the construction business itself seems to have taken a rather bad turn. Average daily contracts this month are 47 per cent under the July, 1929, average and some 43 per cent below the average last month. This does not speak well of the industry which was depended upon to lead the recovery in business.

Textile markets offered several matters of interest during the week in the reductions on rayon and the opening of clothing fabric staples by the leading producer. The rayon cut was long rumored, due to the drop in silk, and amounted to 20 and 25 cents a pound or from 13 to 22 per cent. The reductions announced in wool goods ran up to 10 per cent, coincident with the close of the London wool auction where the prices were from 5 to 15 per cent under those at the May sale.

While there is an opinion now that the heat will reduce crop yields and surpluses, prices have not gained much, and results are much in doubt and still lean toward the unfavorable.

Another Loss for Exports. Picking a Summer week-end for issuing a report that was four days late, the Department of Commerce published a foreign trade statement for June that Washington was probably anxious to see overlooked.

Exports for the month at $299,000,000 were 24 per cent under the total of $393,176,000 for June, 1929. Imports valued at $250,000,000 compared with $353,000,000 last year, a decline of 29 per cent.

What added particular value to the June figures was the calculation of foreign trade results for the half year. The loss in exports amounted to 20.7 per cent, while the decline in imports came to 24 per cent. The favorable balance for the six months was $344,199,000, or $8,486,000 more than in the corresponding period of last year.

A good deal of attention has been drawn from time to time in what one might call a defense of the present depression to the fact that the reaction is world-wide in scope and that we are suffering no more than other countries. However, it may be pointed out that our own loss in exports runs quite a bit higher than the decreases suffered by other leading export nations. The German Credit Company, for instance, calculates the average decline for European countries at 5½ per cent, with non-European countries at 19½ per cent.

The decline in British exports has been 15 per cent, that of Italy 11 per cent, of France 5½ per cent and of Germany 5 per cent. These declines compare with ours of somewhat over 20 per cent.

New Duty for Management. While the question of when the business tide will turn and the problems connected with sales and profit obtain first consideration among industrial interests, there is no gainsaying the fact that the more thoughtful executives of large enterprises are giving an increasing amount of attention to what might be described as the new rôle assumed by progressive management. This is a duty which must be undertaken if business is really to prosper and, in a few words, it is the adoption of a program which will protect workers against unemployment or else ease conditions for the jobless when curtailment becomes necessary.

The smaller manufacturers, to an extent, have always accepted this duty, not for the larger interests at stake but because their closeness to their employes has engaged their sympathies. They do not lay off their friends so quickly. They try to carry on even at personal sacrifice when, to protect dividends, the big companies are coldly cutting down their working forces.

Since immigration restriction and the growth in skill required to operate new machinery, the larger companies have appreciated the advantages in "holding together their organizations" as long as possible in spells of business reaction, and many of them have also recognized the importance of conserving purchasing power by keeping their employes on the payroll, if only for part-time work.

The various expedients adopted to meet the issue of unemployment and reduced buying power point to progress in the new duty of management, but they have, as yet, not met the issues squarely enough to prevent continuance of a major depression. The great handicap is the promotion of the idea that this issue is one for individual judgment and handling, when what is needed is a thorough-going study of measures whereby management may be as assiduous in its protection of its employes as it is in looking after its stockholders. After all, the welfare of one group makes for the prosperity of the other.

Retailers Restricting Their Buyers. One might imagine, with so many new developments in the merchandise markets, that the retail stores this season would find more reason than usual in having their buyers make frequent trips to keep in touch with conditions and to take advantage of new and lower-priced offerings. The opposite policy, however, has been adopted by a great many retail concerns who are not only cutting down drastically upon early buying appropriations, but also curtailing to a marked extent on the trips of their buyers. One very large establishment is reported to have ordered its buyers to cut their trips in half.

The reasons for this policy in a way are obvious, though, perhaps, not altogether well advised. Economy is the order of the day in the retail world. Then, too, it is believed that operations in this unsettled period must be moved closer to the consumer—there is no room for the usual guesswork involved in early purchasing. Another and possibly stronger reason is that delayed buying by the stores is expected to result in a pressure that will produce further price reductions in the wholesale markets and convince some manufacturers who have so far held up the concessions which might be expected that to do business they must accept the lower level on values now established.

Hand-to-mouth buying was brought about in 1920-21, but there continued to be a good deal of advance purchasing, the profit of which was open to question. In the period ahead there may develop a reduction in early orders to amounts which will serve only to test out consumer demand, following which volume and not hand-to-mouth orders will be placed on the basis of actual consumer demand as determined by these experiments.

WHOLESALE ORDERS UP.

Credit Queries Reflect an Increase for Week and Year.

Buying at wholesale in the merchandise markets last week, as reflected by inquiries received by the Credit Clearing House, showed an increase over the previous week and also over the corresponding week last year. With the average weekly inquiries on merchandise orders in the wholesale market during 1927 taken as 100, the index of the Clearing House last week stood at 70. This compares with 62 for the preceding week and 69 for the corresponding week last year.

The average order for the week just closed was $538, compared with $311 for the week before. Changes in recommendation during the past week were approximately 37 per cent greater than those of the corresponding week last year. Overbuys were very active last week.

MILLINERS FOR SCIENCE.

Will Meet After Show to Consider Better Methods for Industry.

Members of the Retail Millinery Association will close their Fall fashion show, scheduled for Aug. 5 at the Hotel Astor, by a meeting of the membership at which plans for placing the millinery industry on a more scientific basis will be discussed, Joseph Rabinovich, president of the organization, said yesterday. Economists and experts in efficiency and style problems will be invited to address the gathering, he said.

"There is a definite need for the establishment of a uniform and scientific sales policy among manufacturing houses to supersede the confused and varied policies in vogue today," he explained. "This question and the possibility of promoting a consumer demand for a wider variety of modes and materials in hats are the chief subjects slated for discussion."

HOLDS PRICE IS KEY TO BRAND PROBLEM

Non-Discrimination Suggested as Way to Regain Lost Trade by Dry Goods Official.

WHAT ONE TEST SHOWED

Advertised Soap Sold Twice as Fast as Private Brand—Organized Distributer More Potent.

Manufacturers of nationally advertised brands of merchandise whose sales are shrinking because of competition from private label goods can regain much of their lost business by adopting a strict policy of non-discrimination in price, Flint Garrison, director general of the Wholesale Dry Goods Institute, told THE TIMES yesterday. The difficulties now faced by manufacturers in the textile, grocery and many other fields, because of private label competition, are traceable to the fact that some manufacturers in the past began granting a low price to one class of buyers and withholding it from others, he charged.

"Specifically, the discrimination in prices enabled chain stores to purchase goods at a lower price than independents and forced wholesalers to create their own brands to meet the situation," Mr. Garrison continued. "When this step was taken the manufacturer lost one good outlet for his merchandise. He lost the second when the chains also went in for private labels."

Mr. Garrison, whose experience has been confined chiefly to the dry goods field, pointed out that in many of the chain dry goods stores which originally received special concessions from manufacturers of nationally advertised brands of merchandise, as much as 90 per cent of the stock now carried is of the private brand variety.

Private Label a Fixture.

"The private label is also a prominent fixture in the independent stores," he continued, "but I believe that most independent retailers would be willing to feature the nationally known brands if they could be assured of being able to purchase their stocks on an even basis with all competitors. All things being equal, it is easier to sell the nationally known brand than the private label variety."

This fact, Mr. Garrison said, was borne out in a series of experiments he conducted with two brands of toilet soap of equal quality. One, a nationally known product, and the other, an unknown brand, were used to test public reaction to private label merchandise. During one period both products were advertised and displayed on an equal footing, later the private brand was featured and the other relegated to an obscure place on the store shelves, and finally the nationally known product was given the preferred "spot" and the private brand subordinated.

"When sold on an equal footing, the advertised product moved more than twice as fast as the unknown brand," he explained. "Sales on the latter, however, jumped immediately when it was displayed alone and we did a profitable business on the unknown soap while it was being featured. When positions were reversed and the private brand was placed on the shelves, while the national product was prominently displayed, the balance of sales changed at once and the advertised brand sole in far greater volume under those conditions than the privately labeled product had.

More Profit in National Brand.

"The results of this experiment convinced me that the private brand can be handled profitably by any store but that the nationally known product can be sold in greater volume and with less sales effort. It proves also that the branded item enjoys a tremendous advantage in sales provided it receives the support of the retailer.

"Manufacturers who are now in difficulties because of shrinking markets have failed to realize that the organized distributer of merchandise, whether chain or indepedent, if highly efficient, plays a more important part in the merchandizing scheme than does the efficient manufacturer who advertised his product direct to the consumer. In a test of strength the high-powered distributer can always win out over the high-powered producer.

"The few manufacturers who recognized this truth years ago and have consistently enforced a non-discrimination policy in their sales to independents, buying groups and chain organizations are not confronted now with the difficulty of holding their markets. Their goods are on the shelves of stores in all three groups and are being given the retail cooperation they merit.

"Other producers whose sales are showing a steady shrinkage can regain the confidence and patronage of the independent retailer only by revamping their present selling methods and replacing them by a strict policy of selling their trade-marked goods at one price to all buyers. The process will take time, but the business regained will provide a generous return for the effort."

VAGUE ON RETAIL DECLINE.

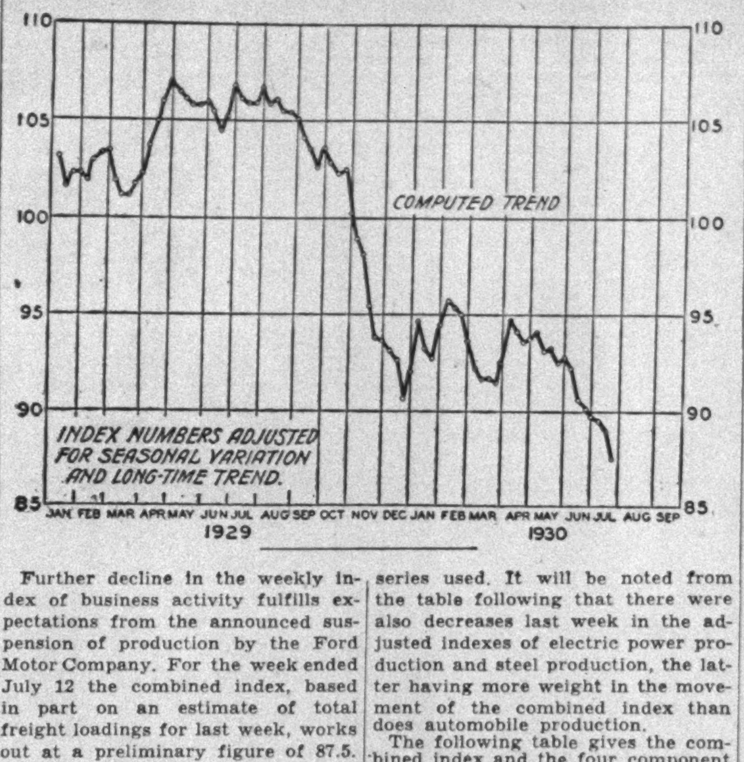
Banker Uncertain Whether Public or Prices Explain It.

Indications that retail sales in July may show as much of an average decline as the 9 per cent drop shown in the Federal Reserve figures for June led a banking executive here who is in close touch with the retail situation to raise the question of whether the slump reflected increasing sales resistance on the part of the consumer.

"Frankly," he said, "I am at a loss to figure whether the drop in sales volume is due to lower retail prices, occasioned by the commodity decline, or to increased sales resistance by consumers. It may be said, however, that the lower retail price level has been a continuing process through the early months of the year, whereas retail distribution did not begin to fall off sharply until June.

"The situation, of course, will demand close analysis by retailers, particularly with reference to its Fall aspects. In some instances the attitude of consumers may be affected by an actual decline in their purchasing power and in others by an excess of caution which is causing them to withhold purchasing. I do not believe that the flood of low price advertising which has developed is materially helping the stores under present circumstances."

Further Decline in Weekly Business Index Caused by Recessions in Three of Its Series



Further decline in the weekly index of business activity fulfills expectations from the announced suspension of production by the Ford Motor Company. For the week ended July 12 the combined index, based in part on an estimate of total freight loadings for last week, works out at a preliminary figure of 87.5. This represents a decline of 14-10 points, or 1½ per cent, from last week's revised business index of 88.9. The index for the corresponding week last year was 105.9.

The decrease in automobile production, already noted, involved a drop of the automobile index last week to 42.9 from 83.3 for the preceding week, this being much the largest decline last week in the series used. It will be noted from the table following that there were also decreases last week in the adjusted indexes of electric power production and steel production, the latter having more weight in the movement of the combined index than does automobile production.

The following table gives the combined index and the four component series, each of which has been adjusted for seasonal variation, long-time trend and variations in cyclical amplitudes:

	Week Ended— July 19, 1930.	July 12, 1930.	July 20, 1929.

BUYERS SHOP MARKET; CAREFUL ON ORDERS

Cloth Frock in Various Ranges Outstanding—Cushion Brim Hats Well Ordered.

The outstanding fashion theme in important dress collections in varying price ranges is the new cloth frock, according to the report prepared especially for THE TIMES by Felix Lilienthal & Co., resident buyers. A good quantity of these frocks will be sold for August and September business in both the conservative and extreme fashions, the report stated. In shades, brown is the season's favorite, with black running a close second.

In styles, diagonal lines are frequently seen, with patent leather belts and buttons as the outstanding accessories. Pleats are popular again and are being used for evening. The importance of the sleeve is increasing, with considerable attention given to the space between the elbow and the wrist.

The new lines of $10.50 dresses are being shown, all stressing travel tweeds and tailored schoolgirl types. Out-of-town buyers in the market are shopping very extensively and making very careful purchases.

In coats the accepted silhouette is the molded and slightly fitted garment with a sweep from 72 to 78 inches, according to the treatment of the body. Dull broadcloth fabrics with a slight nap are popular materials, especially in black, brown and blue, with the first-named color being bought on an average of about 75 per cent.

Mink, kolinsky and beaver are the outstanding furs in the very high priced coats. Blue fox, natural lynx and paradise fitch are also taking well. In the popular priced range, kit fox in the silver dye, red fox, Persian lamb and Russian caracul are popular. The monotone tweed in plain colors, such as black, brown and green, is the important sports fabric.

There are no new developments in the fur market as manufacturers are working on their orders for August sales requirements.

Cushion brim hats, ranging in price from $36 a dozen up, are being sold in good quantity. The hats this season will be worn well off the forehead.

Fall lines of blouses have officially opened, featuring a wide range of fabrics in overblouse and tunic models.

BETTER COMPARISONS MADE

Mr. Vincent Suggests 1927-1929 as Basis for Viewing Sales.

Present slow conditions in industry are being aggravated because of the pessimistic views taken by many business men who make a hurried comparison of this year's sales figures with those of last year and assume that business is much worse than it actually is, according to Alexander Vincent, secretary of the Sterling Silversmith's Guild of America, Inc. Executives would gain a truer conception of present-day business if they compared their present sales volume with an index figure drawn from the average amount of business done over the period from 1927 to 1929, he argued.

"Such a chart would show that trade is subnormal but not to the extent which the majority of business men seem to believe," Mr. Vincent said. "In the sterling silver industry, for instance, a chart made up on the plan I mentioned shows that sales reached their lowest point in March and are now actually climbing. Many other industries doubtless would discover the same thing from similar charts."

EXPENSE RATIO THE TEST.

Retailer Says This, and Not Volume Increases, Governs Results.

Not volume increases but a balanced ratio between the volume gain and the expense of obtaining it will be the acid test of a retail store's operations for the last half of this year, according to a retail executive here.

"There has been much talk recently about profitless volume," this man said yesterday. "Much of this is justified and I have no quarrel with the basis on which such criticism rests. It must be remembered, however, that a store normally has to increase its sales or fall behind in the swift pace of retail competition.

"Now, to get volume increases in the face of difficult conditions since the first of the year has inevitably proved expensive. Pressure and sales promotions all along the line have been required, and they cost money, more money than is normally expended. In some stores the expense percentage in relation to volume gains is notably high for the period. Those showing a low expense ratio may be expected to show excellent results for the year as a whole."

PRODUCTS REFLECTING REDUCED RAYON PRICES

Came at Opportune Time, Trade Claims—Hosiery and Spreads Will Be Revised.

The reduction in rayon prices last week, which had been anticipated and regarded as inevitable, due to the low levels to which raw silk had descended, was made at a time when it did the least harm, a canvass of the trade revealed yesterday. According to statements by cloth producers, stocks on hand were very low and the reductions had little adverse effect. One large manufacturer stated it was merely a matter of marking down present supplies and then buying new yarns.

The yarn reduction, which ran up to 25 cents a pound, is not being entirely passed on to cutters-up for basic economic reasons, and it is difficult, due to the various grades of cloth, to determine what average reduction cloth producers are making. It is considerable, however, and is reflected in the lower prices which are being issued on men's and women's rayon underwear and hosiery.

The reduction of yarn prices is a constructive one, in the opinion of B. Hacker of Sil-Ray Products, Inc., and will shortly exert a strengthening tendency on prices of rayon fabrics after the preliminary uncertainty has passed. Mr. Hacker stated that these lower price lists merely reflect the actual prices recently prevailing, which have been available to rayon buyers under one guise or another for some time. Publication of the price cuts, however, eliminated the uncertainty. Rayon prices are so low, Mr. Hacker thinks, that the next price change will doubtless be upward.

In the garment manufacturing branch of the rayon industry, yarn producers have been commended for making the move at this time. The cuts are opportune, it was said, as the season for men's rayon underwear has practically ended and the Fall business in women's wear is just about to begin. Mills have an opportunity to revise their figures. As men's polo shirts enjoyed an excellent business this year, it is expected that reduced prices will augment the trade considerably next season.

As far as prices are concerned, reductions up to 50 cents a dozen in women's undergarments are taking place, it was reported. Manufacturers have two alternatives, apparently. One is to rebuild their lines with a finer gauge fabric and to add fancier trimmings, maintaining the same price. The other is to continue the present lines, in the same styles and weights, and pass along the reduction to the consumer.

Women's seamless hosiery will be revised downward, it was said. These prices will be adjusted gradually, though to what extent is not known. It is also reported that there will be a slight revision in the prices of rayon bedspreads on the part of manufacturers, who desire to give consumers the benefit of lower raw-material costs.

PLAN HOUSEWARES SHOW.

First Exhibition of the Sort Here to Be Held Sept. 15-20.

A special trade show at which novelty furniture, lamps and home furnishings suitable for Christmas gifts will be exhibited for the benefit of buyers will be held at the New York Furniture Exchange Building Sept. 15 to 20, according to an announcement made there yesterday. Although the management of the exchange is cooperating in the undertaking, the show has been sponsored by 150 manufacturers and selling agents who have space there, it was stated.

The exhibition, claimed to be the first of its kind held here, was planned last week at a special meeting of those interested. Included among the items which will be exhibited will be novelty furniture of all kinds, lamps, radio cabinets, children's furniture and toy baby carriages. A large number of buyers are usually in the city around the middle of September and many others are expected to be attracted here by the special display.

Neckwear Display Prizes Awarded.

Clement Kieffer Jr., display manager for the Kleinhans Company, Buffalo, has been awarded the first prize of $250 in the Father's Day window-display contest sponsored by the Associated Men's Neckwear Industries, Inc., according to an announcement from that organization yesterday. The second prize of $150 was won by R. F. Bates, display manager of the B. R. Baker Company, Cleveland. V. Andrews, display manager of the Desmond Clothing Store, Los Angeles, Cal., carried off the third award of $100. Other prizes totaling $500 were also distributed.

EXPORTS TO SUFFER FURTHER, HE CLAIMS

R. L. Bracken of Managers' Club Foresees Steady Shrinkage if Rates Remain.

MANY ORDERS HELD UP NOW

Awaiting Action on Flexible Tariff; Boosts in Foreign Duties Considered Inevitable.

The United States is faced with the prospect of a steadily shrinking foreign trade during the next ten years unless the flexible provisions of the present tariff law can be invoked to lower many of the high rates now in effect, Roger L. Bracken, export manager of the Millers Falls Company and president of the Export Managers' Club of New York, told THE TIMES yesterday. Mr. Bracken returned this week from a four months' business trip through the principal countries of Europe, where he reports that blanket boycotts against American goods have been instituted in some quarters, while in all countries the resentment against the new tariff here is intense.

"Certain lines of merchandise manufactured in France, Germany, England and other countries are now prominently displayed by foreign establishments which formerly handled only American goods of these types," Mr. Bracken continued.

Where Situation Is Pronounced.

The situation, he said, is most pronounced in Switzerland and France. In the former country, where the pinch of higher duties on laces and watch movements is keenly felt, a boycott against American goods has reached such a point that persons driving American made automobiles have been compelled by the force of public opinion to dispose of them and buy cars made in France or other near-by countries.

"This same feeling extends to all merchandise," he pointed out. "Merchants who have been steady customers of American producers have been forced to drop their lines because of this antagonism.

"In France the sentiment isn't quite so rabid but it is sufficient to bar some products which formerly found a ready market and make the sale of all others more difficult."

In Germany, Italy, England, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Holland and Denmark, Mr. Bracken noted the same attitude, although in a milder form.

Reports of Canceled Orders.

"Reports of canceled orders for American goods were common abroad, but I didn't get any direct testimony of them," Mr. Bracken asserted. "I did, however, run into scores of representatives for American companies who told me that orders ranging from $50,000 in some instances to as much as $150,000 in others have been held up on instructions from buyers who are waiting to be convinced that the flexible clause in our tariff will actually correct what they regard as injustices in the rates. Whether the orders will ever be shipped or not depends upon the manner in which the flexible clause is applied."

Higher tariff barriers in all European countries are seen as inevitable by Mr. Bracken, who predicted that, unless something occurs to reduce our tariff rates, manufacturers here will be forced into establishing an elaborate network of factories in foreign countries to hold their markets.

Raw, as well as manufactured, materials will feel the pinch of shrinking markets, he added. Many countries are talking of turning to Egypt for their cotton and are now buying their citrus fruits from other sources of supply.

For the present, Mr. Bracken suggested that travelers for American companies emphasize the possibilities of the flexible tariff clause in their sales arguments for goods made in this country.

ADVISES 'CONTACT' MAN FOR TRADE EXECUTIVES

Mr. Sweitzer Sees Advantages in Plan to Have Expert Counsel Group.

Many trade associations experiencing difficulties at this time would be able to improve their services and increase their value to members if their executives had the advantages of advice and counsel from a "contact" man versed in the newest developments in trade association work, Channing E. Sweitzer, managing director of the National Retail Dry Goods Association, said yesterday. Mr. Sweitzer, who is also chairman of the executive committee of the local group of American Trade Association Executives, said his committee has discussed the need for such a "contact" man among local trade group executives, but so far has taken no definite steps.

"The plan as developed by members of the committee contemplates the retention of some nationally known trade association expert who could advise individual executives on their problems," Mr. Sweitzer continued. "He could be of invaluable service in exchanging ideas and helping one group to adopt plans proved successful among others.

"Most trade association executives at this time are looking for methods of rendering greater service to their industries in spite of the fact that their finances are being curtailed through loss of membership and for other reasons. If they could be told of the various ways in which their contemporaries are meeting the same problems the results should be quite helpful."

Auto Tax to Be Higher.

A new Esthonian law abrogates conventional rates of import duty automobiles. The expected early forcement of this law will theref result in the application of the g eral rates which are on a weig basis in place of the treaty rates. is understood that the change w involve the assessment of larg amounts of duty.

France has increased the duty rat on lard, frozen pork, hogs, ha cheese, oats, rye, potatoes and pota starch.

WORLD LAW SESSION TO BRING NOTABLES

150 Foreign Delegates Coming Here in September to Discuss Problems.

TO STUDY NEUTRAL RIGHTS

Conference on Duties of Nations at War Will Have Bearing on Progress of Disarmament.

International cartels, war-time contracts and various other problems will be among topics of discussion when the International Law Association meets here in convention Sept. 2 to 9. More than 150 foreign delegates will be guests of the American branch of the organization.

"The subjects to be discussed at the conference in September include some of the most important problems of practical international law," Arthur H. Kuhn, vice president of the American group, declared in a statement. "They affect not only the relations of States as such, but also the interests of private individuals.

"Take, for example, the question of neutral rights in time of war. It is generally recognized that upon some substantial agreement between nations on this subject will depend in large measure the further progress of disarmament. At the last conference of the International Law Association, held at Warsaw in 1928, a committee was appointed, with Judge Thorvald Boye of the Supreme Court of Norway at its head, to draft a convention on the rights and duties of belligerents with regard to neutral property at sea.

New Neutrality Agreements.

"The draft is to be presented in September along with a proposed treaty on neutrality in land warfare. There is at present no international treaty generally recognized on neutrality in maritime warfare other than the Declaration of Paris of 1856. The London Declaration of 1909 was never ratified. The draft treaty now proposed embodies some of the provisions of the Reduction of Naval Armaments Treaty signed in London on April 22, 1930, now ratified by the United States Senate. But it goes far beyond that treaty into the more detailed provisions on contraband, blockade, prize and other questions."

He stressed the importance of legislative control of cartels, and continued: "A subject which is of great interest to international commerce, even in time of peace, is the effect of war on contracts. Unless there be some certainty as to the classes of contracts dissolved by war, and the extent to which persons in neutral countries are likely to have their contracts suspected or made void, there will be a consequent dislocation of international commerce even in peace times."

Another question, the discussion of which is expected to arouse interest, he said, is that of uniform rules for legalizing documents of one country for use before the courts of another.

"The condition which discordant legislation has created in the various countries is almost chaotic," he declared. "It tends to increase the cost of litigation everywhere, and often seriously impedes the course of justice. It affects the interest of poor and rich alike. It is a question of local procedure as well as of international concern.

To Discuss Oversea Sales.

"Then there is the draft of a series of rules relating to oversea sales which include cost, insurance and freight. This vitally affects the interest of the export trade and the banks which finance it. It was tentatively adopted at the Warsaw conference in 1928 and has been made the object of a careful analysis by the United States Chamber of Commerce, but is to be further considered at the New York conference this year. The International Chamber of Commerce, at its congress in Amsterdam in July, 1929, approved uniform regulations on documentary credits which were stated to be 'of the utmost importance to international banking and trade.'"

The list of foreign delegates to the world conference as announced yesterday is as follows:

Gums that have become "touchy" and soft need Ipana and massage

A SCHOOL-GIRL of eighteen and a woman of fifty are equally exposed to troubles of the gums!

For when "pink tooth brush" appears, at any age, it's a sign that the gums are weak, and need immediate care.

"Touchy" gums are the result of soft food and hurried eating. They grow soft through lack of work. They bleed. And a host of diseases—gingivitis, Vincent's Disease, pyorrhea—threatens the loss of the loveliest and the most perfect teeth.

Prevent gum trouble. Don't let it get a head start. For "pink tooth brush" can be quickly defeated with Ipana Tooth Paste and massage.

Wake up your Gums with Ipana and massage!

Massage of the gums, with finger or with brush, is what dentists order for soft and bleeding gums! Thousands of them add "with Ipana", for Ipana is more than a delightful tooth paste, it is specifically compounded to take care of the health of your gums.

Ipana contains ziratol, a hemostatic and antiseptic often employed by the foremost dentists in their professional work at the chair.

So, if your gums bleed easily, if your tooth brush "shows pink", restore them to health with massage and Ipana Tooth Paste. Wake up the lazy tissues. Send fresh clean blood coursing to the stagnant cells. That's the modern way to fight gum troubles!

You'll like Ipana, you'll like its taste. You will be amazed to see how clean and beautiful it makes your teeth—how healthy it keeps your gums!

Start tonight with Ipana. Go to your druggist and get a full-size tube today. It's the best dentifrice that money can buy, and that kind of a dentifrice, like that kind of a dentist, is never a luxury.

PRODUCTION AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

For the economist and statistician there is little new in the League of Nations' finding that world production since 1913 has increased by 25 per cent and the internal trade of the nations by 22 per cent. The lay public which has become familiar with the fact of post-war recovery will nevertheless be impressed by the degree of progress recorded. The layman's information and impressions necessarily lag further behind the march of events than is the case with the expert. This would be particularly true when the pace of development has been so swift as in the last three or four years. For it is during this period that the advance over pre-war conditions has been registered. It was not until 1925 or 1926—the latter the year of the English general strike—that the nations of Europe definitely wrenched themselves loose from the paralysis of war and war effects. Recuperation was proportionate to the long illness. The gain of a fourth in the world's output of goods, the gain of more than a fifth in the world's exchange of goods, was scored since 1925, the greater part since 1926.

For the disciple of MALTHUS there is little comfort in the figures from Geneva. During the fifteen years that production went up 25 per cent and trade 22 per cent the increase in the world's population is placed at only 10 per cent. Other theorists have also something to think about. It was a widespread belief, for example, that as a result of the agrarian revolution in Europe after the Armistice, crops were bound to show a decline for many years. All over Central Europe great estates were cut up into small peasant holdings, and a loss in efficiency was taken for granted. Russia's huge pre-war grain exports came chiefly from the large estates and bigger peasants' holdings, and the present collective farm campaign in Russia has for its object the restoration of the vanished grain surplus. But now Geneva reports that the increase in the production of foodstuffs from 1926 to 1928 was greater in Europe outside of Russia than anywhere else in the world. Similarly the growth of internal trade during this period was greater in this Central and East European region of peasant renaissance than anywhere else in the world. Evidently there enters into the problem of agricultural efficiency the psychological factors of contentment and energy arising out of the feeling of proprietorship.

How are these League of Nations figures to be read in connection with these other Geneva figures about world unemployment? Not counting the United States and Japan among important industrial nations, the idle workers are estimated at more than six millions. For the entire world they would be in excess of ten millions. There are two partial answers. Since 1913 there has been a very large increase in the working population of the world, due not only to mere increase in total population but to a larger ratio of workers to population. In Great Britain this increase has been estimated at something like three-quarters of a million. In Germany it would be even more, counting the three-quarters of a million men absorbed before the war by the army and navy. All over the world women have been entering industry in greater numbers. The second and more far-reaching answer is that unemployment of the extent of 1930 is an exceptional condition, following, as a matter of fact, upon a heavy decline in production. When the present digestive disturbances in world industry have been surmounted, we may expect unemployment to show a closer correspondence to normal production and trade.

THE CANADIAN ELECTION.

Tomorrow's general election in Canada will close a campaign that has been spirited between the two parties and marked by sharp exchanges between the leaders of the Liberals and Conservatives. Prime Minister KING has made a vigorous canvass covering all parts of the Dominion, while his Conservative rival, Mr. BENNETT, has confined his efforts largely to the two Provinces of Quebec and Ontario. In them the electoral battle will probably be lost or won. Quebec is expected to remain almost solidly Liberal. Of this fact the opponents of the King Government have been making artful though not public use, trying to insinuate into the minds of Scotch Presbyterians in British Columbia and in the rural parts of Ontario the danger of having Catholic Quebec too strong in the counsels of the Government at Ottawa. Here we have one more indication that Canadian political methods are not so unlike our own, though anti-Catholic sentiment could not be roused in the Dominion with anything like the virulence which attended it two years ago in the United States. What the Canadian Conservatives are counting upon with much more confidence is the winning of seats in Ontario now held by Liberals. These number twenty-six out of eighty-two in the last Parliament, though for several years prior to the last election the Liberal representation from Ontario was kept down to a dozen or less. To that figure the Conservatives now predict that it will again be reduced. If it is, the defeat of the King Government will be almost certain.

Real and clear-cut issues between the two political parties seem hardly to exist. Both of them are now pledged to the policy of protection. This gives occasion to the charge of inconsistency or recreancy brought against Prime Minister KING, who used to be known as a free trader. But changed circumstances, including first of all the new American tariff, have led him to advocate higher and countervailing customs duties, though naturally the Conservatives accuse him of merely having caught them in bathing and stolen their clothes. Their hopes in the election, however, are pinned less on questions of fiscal policy than on their general allegation that the Liberal Government has shown itself in office sadly "incompetent." This is definitely linked up with the business depression from which Canada is suffering along with the rest of the world, and with unemployment. On the latter subject Mr. KING has made indiscreet remarks which have been turned against him. One of his statements was that the Dominion Government could not be expected to grant money for unemployment relief to any Province which had a Tory Government. This was aimed directly at Premier FERGUSON of Ontario, who has taken the field against the Prime Minister. His power and popularity in Ontario may have a decisive effect in that Province.

Americans have apparently taken little interest in this Canadian election. So far as that means neutrality between the two parties striving for control of the Dominion Government, it is well enough. But we cannot afford to ignore a political movement in Canada which, in so far as it portends a greater preference for British goods and a higher tariff against American, cannot fail to be of great and continuous importance for the United States.

THE UNITED STATES AS BUNCOMBE COUNTY.

Some of us may wish that the Appendix of the Congressional Record could be taken out. As it hasn't been, there are martyrs to duty who must read it. The performance of that duty brings to the performer the venerable and too little honored name of the Hon. FELIX WALKER of North Carolina, who said, at some great moment in the Sixteenth Congress, that he was "bound to make a speech for Buncombe." The words are immortal. The speaker is all but forgotten. We get a new affection for him as Majority Leader TILSON and Representative WOOD of Indiana "extend their remarks" and the facts.

Mr. TILSON says that the Republican party has fulfilled "every major promise" it made in 1928. For his benefit let us read this elegant extract from the platform:

> For the Republican party we are justified in claiming a major share of the credit for the position which the United States occupies today.

This is as true now as it was then. The father of prosperity can't disown his ugly duckling, adversity. The new tariff is not "perfect," but it is "excellent." But why does Mr. TILSON belabor the Democrats in the present Congress as the foes of protection? The tariff act could not have been passed without the aid of Democratic votes in the Senate. The record of "Yea-and-Nay" votes on the Hawley-Smoot bill in the Senate shows that there were mighty few Democratic Senators who were not protectionists for the supposed benefit of their own States. Mr. WOOD complains because the Democrats say that "the 1930 "tariff act is the most outrageous ever "written, just as they said it of the "1922 act." And just as the Republicans said of the Underwood act. These little pleasantries should be taken in a Buncombean sense. Mr. WOOD talks true Buncombese when he threatens to make the tariff "the outstanding issue if our "Democratic opponents continue in their "ill-judged efforts to insult the intelligence of the American people."

They will, just as their Republican opponents will. Doubtless there will be a number of outstanding issues. Vaccinators will be numerous. The only question is whether the vaccination will "take." Texas, too, is in Buncombe County. Hear our brilliant friend JOHN GARNER:

> Republican inefficiency in dealing with the economic and industrial problems, together with lack of able leadership, has plunged the country into the depths of the most serious depression since the dark days of the World War.

For more than three months these felicities will continue. "'You did!' said "the Hatter. 'I deny it,' said the March "Hare."

A BEAU SABREUR.

Because Major Gen. J. E. B. STUART, commander of LEE's cavalry, did not get his force to the battlefield of Gettysburg, he has been criticized by military tacticians. For a time, in certain circles, STUART shared with LONGSTREET blame for the loss of that battle. But the best military opinion has exonerated him, and of late years it has become united in the contention that "JEB" STUART'S record as a cavalry commander is one of the finest.

General MAURICE of the British Army recently ranged himself powerfully on this side of what was once a controversy, interrupted by the tragic death of STUART at the head of his troops in the engagement at Yellow Tavern in 1864. Now Captain JOHN W. THOMASON Jr. of the United States Marine Corps, a student of tactics and, at the same time, possessor of an engaging literary style, is analyzing STUART'S campaigns in detail for the readers of Scribner's. He has not yet come to Gettysburg; in the August number he completes the routing of POPE and the preparations for the second Battle of Manassas. But it is clear that his view of the absence of STUART from the field at Gettysburg will be in line with that of informed military critics.

In his person, his address and the manner of his life and death "JEB" STUART inevitably is one of our military heroes. Nature's endowment caused him to be known as "Beauty" STUART, but there was no sneer in the title. The cavalry is a dashing service and adds to the glamour that surrounds a soldier. The tragedy of the Confederate downfall, linked with the tragedy of STUART'S own death, frames him immortally. His habit of wearing roses in his coat in season, and a crimson love-knot when the vines were bare; his plumed hat; SWEENY, the banjo-player, his familiar—these elements have made him a romantic figure. But Captain THOMASON is not much concerned with these aspects of his subject. He has undertaken to rewrite, expertly, accurately and with excellent literary style, the story of STUART'S campaigns. And when he is done, there will be a volume as fit for maidens to sigh over and youths to dream upon as for soldiers to study.

Among those to whom the book will be most welcome are Southern writers and educators who have felt for years that the history of the Civil War calls for resurvey. The North Carolina Historical Commission, inspired at the State University, is one of the strongest forces in that movement. Its hope that new histories will dispel the fables of both sides is apparently much in the mind of Captain THOMASON: he is rebuilding some Federal reputations also. And, while he does not stress it, the primary-school balderdash about Northern Puritans and Southern Cavaliers finds steady refutation in his pages. STUART, like LEE and JACKSON and most of the Southern Generals, was a rum-hating, religious man, resembling RUPERT and his troopers only in that he too went into battle on horseback.

TOURISTS IN ANTARCTICA.

Commander J. R. STENHOUSE of Aurora and Discovery fame is planning to take a shipload of tourists to the Ross Sea in the Christmas season, which is Summer in Antarctica. There was bound to be such an undertaking after all the explorers, from SCOTT to BYRD, had told the world over and over again of the sublimity in glacial forms and the magical coloring of the Great Barrier and the mountains towering above it.

"It is a vast wonderland laid out on a "giant scale, in which littleness has no "place," Dr. WILLIAM S. BRUCE said of Antarctica in his "Voyage of the Scotia." The range of vision is sometimes no less than 300 miles, so clear the air. "The climate of these regions in fine weather is magically invigorating," writes H. G. PONTING, photographer to SCOTT'S second expedition. SCOTT himself, gazing on the mountain bastions of McMurdo Sound, declared: "No words of "mine can convey the impressiveness of "the wonderful panorama." The colors in all lights, from early morning to the hour when the midnight sun rims the horizon, have been the delight of descriptive writers. "The greatest untapped "reservoir of health left to the human "race," says HAYES, who adds: "Here is our finest playground and sanatorium." Erebus is doubtless the greatest sight of all. "I have seen," says CHERRY-GARRARD, Fuji, the most dainty and graceful of all mountains, and also Kanchenjunga. Only MICHAEL ANGELO among "men could have conceived such grandeur. But give me Erebus for my "friend." Ship after ship has gone down to the Ross Sea and come away while Summer still lingered. Commander STENHOUSE is planning nothing impracticable.

WHEN UNCLE SAM ENTERTAINS ABROAD.

There can be little surprise at the report that our foreign representatives may not pay for their non-prohibition drinks out of the entertainment fund made available for various Ambassadors, Ministers and Consuls. The real marvel is that the Government has at last come around to allowing any sort of expenses for such official functions. The lack of adequate funds has been one of the chief factors preventing any but men of wealth from accepting important offices in the foreign service.

The present allowance is scarcely munificent. It consists of a sum total of $94,00, to be divided among ninety-five different posts. Furthermore, the sums allotted are tightly restricted by the usual red tape. They may not be used for motor hire, and all sums above $100 can be disbursed only after competitive bids have been asked. But it is at least provided that they may be used for receptions on American official holidays and for functions in honor of distinguished visitors, as well as for the purchase of wreaths and flowers for ceremonial occasions, and for paying tips when required by the custom of the country.

This is good as a beginning. But the allowance is pitifully small. Great Britain, for example, pays its Ambassador in Washington over and above his salary a sum of $65,698 per year for expenses, and furnishes him with his house and its upkeep free of charge. Thus that country spends about as much on the extra expenses of the Ambassador to the United States alone as we do for the entire world.

In government business, however, it is necessary to proceed step by step. The new allowances are helpful. They establish precedents for larger appropriations in the future. In time we may pay our foreign representatives a living wage. The new legislation includes expenses for some of the consulates which in the past have suffered from totally inadequate allowances. In places like Batavia, Java, the American Consul General has the social standing of a Minister and the corresponding social obligations. And yet he has to struggle along as best he may, using up his own patrimony so that his Government may not be branded as "close."

Another year, perhaps, when Secretary STIMSON has more time to devote to routine matters of administration, he may see his way to obtaining larger allowances. So long as the expenses of a foreign position are far greater than its salary, it will be impossible for the Government to use men who do not possess independent means.

LIFE WITH RICHNESS.

Although the novel and the drama have scarcely more than a civil speaking acquaintance in public, they are not strangers artistically, and the novelist is often a discerning man when he lounges about the theatre. In the August issue of Theatre Arts Monthly, J. B. PRIESTLEY, the English novelist, makes one fundamental observation: "There is "in any good novel a certain richness "of life that is hardly ever found on the "stage." "What I like to find in a novel," he declares, "are character and "atmosphere; that is, sharply delineated, "memorable people moving about in a "real world, a world filled with sunlight, moonlight, starlight, candle-light, "wind and weather, early mornings and "late nights, gay, fresh places, sinister "places, musty interiors, living landscapes." He likes the same qualities on the stage. "Broadway" and "Porgy" pleased him because they gave off a thick atmosphere. Although he thinks the theatre is most skillful with light entertainment—> the modern theatre became entirely serious for me, something that could conjure beauty out of life, when I sat through my first performance of "The Cherry Orchard." Here, in this strange play about a group of idle and fantastic Russians, the thing was done. Here was life in all its abundance and richness, its pathos and humor, its terror and beauty. I realized that a modern play could do for me what a great many modern novels can do for me, what nearly all modern plays had refused to do.

Not that the modern stage is lacking in plays of character or atmosphere, or both. When Mr. PRIESTLEY rises to "The Cherry Orchard" he is nibbling at a masterpiece; he will hardly expect to try every play, or every novel, by so lofty a standard. For common usage there are sufficient character and atmosphere in such diverse stage pieces as "Journey's End," "Berkeley Square," "Bird in Hand," "Street Scene," "The Lady From Alfaqueque," "Many Waters" and "The Last Mile." Sometimes the atmosphere may be that of a stormy personality, like O'NEILL'S or O'CASEY'S, or it may be impersonal exoticism, like MEI LAN-FANG. If it is a good play or a good bit of acting, it will suggest a "rich thickness of life," with a magnetism more common to the stage than to the novel.

No one will seriously challenge Mr. PRIESTLEY'S major assertion that most dramatists "are too busy contriving unusual dramatic situations and working "out ingenious schemes of action. * * * "The play of the 'strong situation'—"in which the judge always turned out "to be the father of the young man in "the dock—is beginning to look very "silly these days, but nevertheless it is "still situation and action that are chiefly considered, and character and atmosphere that are left to look after "themselves." Without conceding that novels strike, proportionately, a higher average of excellence than plays, it is common knowledge that the hack playwright knows only the atmosphere of the theatre and the characters of the theatrical workshop. Theatrical life is highly organized; the mandarins of the theatre take pains never to stir far from the footlights. Nature in them is almost lost in art. Only the exceptional dramatist moves about through life with the freedom of a human being, and becomes acquainted with the character of mankind and the atmosphere of places. The literary life is relatively disorganized. Novelists may live anywhere they please, and they do—some of them in Manhattan. The more they write of memorable people and places, the better their readers like them. In fact, the novel maintains a more conscious allegiance to life than the drama.

By way of concluding his article, Mr. PRIESTLEY reminds his readers that the author of "The Cherry Orchard" was a novelist, and inquires about the author of "Hamlet." "What about SHAKESPEARE?" he asks. "Perhaps he was "really a novelist too. He certainly "spent a great deal of his time dramatizing what were virtually novels." But here Mr. PRIESTLEY'S "Look at the Theatre" is temporarily astigmatic. For SHAKESPEARE was a poet. Like DANTE and LEONARDO DA VINCI, he was a ruler of mankind. In his best plays he was—

> A priest to us all
> Of the wonder and bloom of the world.

Poets have that gift above novelists and dramatists. If you leave out the wonder, thus conciliating the worldlings—even so, the bloom will do.

OUR SUMMER MOOTS.

GREEN in his "Short History" presents an impressive picture of the gathering of the freemen of an early English community on a "moot-hill," or around a sacred tree, to order their industry, to frame their laws and to select their representatives for participation in affairs beyond their village bounds. These were primarily places for discussion, and the word "moot" suggests arguing matters simply to bring out what is to be said on both sides of a question. In this sense the institutes at Williamstown and Charlottesville are a kind of academic moot, to debate problems of the nation and even of the world at large. The "moot-horn" has sounded and from near and far several hundred will come to take part.

The Williamstown program emphasizes subjects involving our international relations: the freedom of the seas, the evolution of international public law, Western civilization and the world, the Far Eastern question and Pan-American questions. The Arctic and the Antarctic are within the range of its concern. Men of distinction abroad, like Dr. WALTER SIMON, Sir EUSTACE PERCY and Dr. PAUL MANTOUX, are to take part along with Americans. Those who are to be present as participants in the round-table discussions have been selected because of their special fitness.

The Institute of Public Affairs at the University of Virginia is to confine itself almost wholly within the bounds of the Western Hemisphere. It looks across the border to inquire into the Canadian liquor control system, and ventures to consider specifically our Nicaraguan policy and in general the Latin-American policy of President ROOSEVELT. But democracy as a mode of government is to be under discussion, and it is probable that there will be something said about its working in lands in the other hemisphere as well. Prohibition has the first place on the program and will doubtless be the first in interest.

The Williamstown Institute was a precursor in this field. There are at least seven other institutes of like character scattered from coast to coast. With its ten years of success, and with the attestation of the value of such meetings by the experience of many other centres, it is safe to say that these Summer "mootings" have become an American institution.

FROM A MINARET.

Who has watched sunsets from a minaret
And worshiped them, that watcher nevermore
Will walk with small things. Lo! for him a door
Has opened widely on the Infinite.
He will go hungered on the streets of men
Forevermore, pining for space and wideness.
He will be sick for home as in a wilderness
Man sickens for his kind. Not ever again
Will he be fed with food, but he will be
The nursling of the gods. Another name
Has lightened in him. Fire from the heart of flame
Has fed him. Now only infinity
Can call and the sound reach the straining ears of his heart,
Dimming the years from his sky-home apart.

It is gratifying to learn that Senator Borah's health is as good as ever. It is somewhat less consoling to gather from his projected campaign against Mr. Hoover that his ideas are as fluid as ever.

Who was it remarked the other day that the sons of the wild jackass lie in the trough?

Spanish motorists are experimenting with olive oil as a lubricant, in the interest of the native farmers. Almost any day now the Russian Government may put a caviar-driven airplane on the market.

Our Mayor.

Mr. Walker's late remarks on the government of New York City show again what a vacation will do to tone up a man. After a week's fishing off Montauk the Mayor was unable to discern a single thing seriously wrong with his Administration.

Never, the Mayor pointed out, has the financial credit of the city stood so high as it does today. Municipal bonds regularly fetch a premium. And he might have gone on to point out that on Monday the thermometer stood at 99.

His Honor's interview with his department chiefs was a heart-to-heart talk, and consequently there were present only WNYC, WOR and WJZ. A really public statement by the Mayor would probably involve calling out the Fire Department.

Seven malefactors out of 125,000 city employes the Mayor considers a very good record. A dishonest city servant is such a rarity that, whenever discovered and convicted, Mr. Walker is almost inclined to have him received by the Committee on Distinguished Visitors and photographed on the City Hall steps.

Take it all in all, in this age of disillusion and pessimism it is a thorough delight, this perfect faith of the Mayor's in something, even if it is in himself and his friends.

Crosstown traffic in New York City moves twice as fast under the stagger light system. This obviously calls for twice as many skyscrapers and taxicabs in the shortest time possible.

Facts.

Iceland's Parliament is more than a thousand years old. In that time several naval treaties backed by a 6-to-1 majority sentiment could probably be ratified.

The actual vote in the Senate was: Against the treaty, 9; for the treaty, 58, plus 103 Fahrenheit.

American naval defense having now been betrayed by the Senate into the hands of our enemies, the only ray of hope is that the British House of Commons and the Japanese Diet are getting ready to do some betraying of their own.

Senator Hiram Johnson, much struck by this penchant on the part of national legislatures to play the game of other nations, is rumored to be contemplating a bold but masterly stroke. It is nothing more nor less than an all-round exchange by which the United States Senate would move over to London, the House of Commons to Tokyo and the Japanese Parliament to Washington.

For the London naval treaty to come into force, as we understand it, there remains the necessary exchange of ratifications plus the final disposal of those picturesque miniature gun-turret models mobilized by Senator Hale in the fight against the treaty.

Congressman Hamilton Fish makes no concealment of his desire to change the name of the Soviet trading agency in this country from the Amtorg to the Wastorg.

Wheat.

To her singing talents Marion Talley has by now added histrionic abilities of a high order. In the Sunday rotogravures she is always smiling radiantly at the wheel of her tractor on her 1,600-acre farm, with wheat prices what they are.

Scarcely have the nations decided to beat some of their naval guns into pruning hooks than some one suggests an international conference to reduce wheat acreage. What will they beat their pruning hooks into? Not airplane carriers, let us hope.

Don't sneer at the new tariff bill and what it has done to raise agricultural prices. Just wait till the next crop failure in Argentina, Canada and Russia and then see how the Smoot-Hawley bill will boost American wheat prices.

Modern version: And after the seven fat years in which the land refused to bring forth, there came seven lean years in which the earth was heavy with wheat and the market went to smash.

Is it Chairman Legge's idea to withdraw acres from wheat and turn them into miniature golf courses?

Sport pictures from the other side make it plain that ex-King Manoel of Portugal is having a much better time than the country of which he is ex-King.

Aetat 156.

Zaro Agha claims to have a vague recollection of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln. This puts him in a class with the average American college undergraduate.

In some quarters it has been suggested that his longevity is to be primarily explained by the fact that he was born in 1774.

In addition to fighting in fourteen wars, he recalls no less than five epochs in which the discoveries of science effected a complete revolution in man's existence, and seven occasions when the changing status of women was registered in a radical shortening of skirts followed by a radical increase in the length of same.

But of course the greatest marvel is not that he has lived to be 156 years old, but that he has lived that long before writing a book.

Winter weather in July has come along in Great Britain just in time to give Ramsay MacDonald something to think about.

FEDERATED EUROPE

Diplomatic Situation Behind the Replies to M. Briand

By JAMES T. SHOTWELL.

With the British note of July 17, the government of France is now in receipt of the replies of the European governments to M. Briand's invitation of May 17 to consider what steps should be taken to form a federal union of European States. This closes the opening chapter of the diplomatic proposal which has aroused the interest and attention of the whole world. The next chapter will be opened in the discussion of the Assembly of the League of Nations at Geneva in September. What the nature of that discussion will be no one at present, not even the most experienced of European statesmen, can draw from these replies any accurate forecast.

Geneva has a way of its own. Its action is full of surprises even to the best informed of governments. Although the Assembly is technically a meeting of the representatives of governments, it does not limit itself to programs set for it beforehand like a conference of plenipotentiaries acting under instructions. The "atmosphere of Geneva," to which reference has so often been made by observers of the history of the League, is in reality the atmosphere of public diplomacy in which the interests of an international community find voice and may even, for the time being at least, carry the day against the isolated expression of each constituent nation. This has happened more than once, especially in the discussion of such major problems as that which M. Briand now advances.

The Situation as It Stands.

Without, however, risking any guess as to what may happen in September, we may, to quote the formula of the British note itself, survey, on the basis of the replies sent in, the situation as it stands today; for whatever turn the discussion may ultimately take it is bound to begin upon the basis of these "provisional" judgments which the government of France, and for that matter the Foreign Offices of all the European States, will be studying intensively during the interval between now and the meeting of the Assembly.

The replies of the European governments naturally fall into two great divisions, those of the great powers and those of the smaller ones. Naturally, the former will be most in evidence, but it would be a great mistake to dismiss the latter as unimportant or uninfluential in the State system of Europe today. The League of Nations has wrought a complete change in the status of the small powers. No Metternich can any longer override their policies or ignore their criticisms of inter-European questions; for at the public tribunal of the Assembly of the League their "governments have an equal opportunity with those of the great powers to appeal not only to the delegates of governments listening to them in the hall but to the peoples at home whom they represent."

Journalists from every country are looking on at this debate and reporting the proceedings for all the readers of Europe and the world outside. Sometimes, indeed, the statesmen of the smaller powers speak not only the minds of their own peoples, who, without Geneva, would have no effective representation in the concert of Europe, but remind the delegates of the great powers of those currents of public opinion in their own countries which are not directly represented there.

Attitude of Smaller States.

Nevertheless, the replies of the smaller States to the Briand plan have distinctly less importance than in most other post-war questions which have come before the League. For in the federation of Europe the smaller powers, like the smaller States of the American Union, have more to gain and less to sacrifice than the larger nations. Some of them may, like Rhode Island in the formation of the Union, stand out against the plan for a federal union in order to assert themselves against the further intrusion of their more powerful neighbors, or simply because their recently won liberties are more to them than any far-reaching scheme of European betterment. But the chief reason for discounting in this instance the opinions of the lesser nations is that none of them would probably feel strong enough to exercise a veto against an overwhelming movement backed by the great powers if they were unanimously in favor of the Briand plan.

The three nations, therefore, whose replies should be analyzed in detail are Italy, Germany and Great Britain; and of these by far the most interesting as well as the most important is the British reply. The Italian note is too obviously a move in a diplomatic game. The German answer is too literally a response to the notes struck by M. Briand and contains no element of surprise. In both cases the chief preoccupation was not the international problem but their own dissatisfaction with the status quo. The British note, however, is on a different key. Over against the Briand proposal it raises questions of political theory of the first order and faces the fundamental questions in a fundamental way.

Italian and German Notes.

That is not to say that the Italian and German replies are to be lightly dismissed. On the contrary, it is likely that the discussion at Geneva will deal largely with the counter-propositions which they advance in their answers to France, if for no other reason than because they deal with practical questions calling for adjustment through the existing diplomatic international machinery before proceeding to any thoroughgoing scheme for federal union of European States. Their answers, therefore, are directly in the line of the normal work of the League of Nations as it stands; for the Assembly exists for the year-to-year adjustment of its members, rather than for the discussion of revolutionary proposals in the structure of international relations. A word, therefore, about the practical suggestions in the Italian and the German notes.

The Italian note was commented upon in terms of surprise at the time of its publication. It was stated that this was the first time that one of the allied powers of the World War had joined in the formal diplomatic protest against the settlement of Versailles. But this is a somewhat misleading way to read the Italian text. Mussolini's protest has little historical connection with the grievances of the Central Powers, for Italy's unsatisfactory share in the Versailles settlement was chiefly due to the blundering diplomacy of Sonnino in concentrating the Italian demands upon Fiume. Italian nationalism, sentimentally led astray by D'Annunzio, was not thinking then of the opportunities in Africa which Mussolini is now anxious to have opened up. In short, Italy has itself to blame for its share of the Treaty of Versailles.

Italian Bid to Hungary.

The post-war years, however, have drawn Italy into rivalry with France, and therefore Mussolini's reply to Briand seeks to strengthen the diplomatic bridge to Hungary, and if possible to Germany, upon which much engineering skill has been expended in these recent months. Mussolini's note is more an effort to insure a place for Italy in an anti-French European combination than a collaboration with France upon the scheme for international peace. It is above all a further bid to Hungary, with a hostile eye upon that flank of the Little Entente which rests upon the Balkans. Viewed from the standpoint of Southeastern Europe, it is indeed an instigation to that very kind of intrigue which has held Europe so long in anarchy. Fortunately, however, the influence of Germany once again weighs more in that part of the world than Fascist diplomacy; for republican Germany, returning to the best Bismarckian traditions, is not prepared to embark on any dangerous adventures in the Near East. It is not sufficiently realized how much the peace of Europe owes to the cautious foresight of the Wilhelmstrasse, which keeps it back from any too close entanglements with the government that holds down the Trentino. The Fascist appeal strikes a responsive chord only among those German and Austrian reactionaries who would overturn not merely the terms of Versailles but the republican movement in Central Europe.

If the Italian reply is a rather obvious effort at the diplomatic cleverness of the old régime, the German note, on the contrary, bears the impress of that consistent sincerity which has been the legacy of Stresemann. While Germany is unwilling to enter into a political arrangement which would fasten upon it permanently the conditions imposed in the Versailles Treaty, there is no official tendency to charge M. Briand with having any such sinister designs, and Germany is ready whole-heartedly to study the problem which France has posed.

A Basis of Negotiations.

As a matter of fact, Germany had, at least unofficially, begun the study of this problem years ago. The Briand plan is very largely drafted along the lines of the Pan-Europe scheme of Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, whose writings have been widely circulated and whose organization has met regularly in conventions in the European capitals for some years past. There has been strong German support for this Pan-Europe movement, especially among German industrialists and men of affairs who are too intelligent to accept the orgy of nationalism of the post-war period, the same men who have been building up German cartels across the Rhine and extending German business in Southeastern Europe. The economic leaders of Germany are therefore on the side of the Briand plan so far as general theory goes, and the present German Government is largely an exponent of the views of these men. Therefore, the German approval of the central idea of the lessening of the extremes of sovereignty is not a mere diplomatic courtesy, but a basis for genuine negotiations.

On the other hand, the pressure of militarist dissatisfaction with the status quo forces the German Government to explore the possibilities of using the Briand plan as an open door for pacific political readjustment. The text of the German note does not read as if there were much real hope of progress along this line as yet. But France does not need to be reminded that, having raised the issue of post-war nationalism, a failure to achieve progress by agreement at Geneva would strengthen in Germany those forces of militarist reaction which look to the day when the old régime can be restored in Germany and the little "upstart nations" on its eastern and southern frontier be wiped from the map.

The Position of France.

It may be, therefore, that M. Briand, in advancing a scheme for Continental cooperation, is forcing home a crisis in Central Europe. If so, France may very well find that the coming Assembly in Geneva will mark a change in the basis of its program of security. For it must support the forces of liberalism in Germany against any such eventuality as that envisaged by the steel-helmeted successors of the Prussian Junkers. One might even hazard the thought that M. Tardieu's consent to the Briand plan may have been partly based upon the idea of a sort of reinsurance treaty against the forces of reaction in Central Europe, but just how this can be harmonized with the support of the Little Entente remains to be seen.

Very different from these Continental replies, preoccupied with questions of immediate policy, is the note which the Labor Government of Britain has just submitted. If ever history had seemed to repeat itself, it was in this instance. A little more than 100 years ago, at the close of the Napoleonic War, England replied to the plans of Czar Alexander I for a holy alliance to establish peace on the basis of the Christian religion in almost the same terms as in this reply to the statesman who once led the fight for the disestablishment of the Church in France.

There is even an external resemblance between the forms of diplomacy used by Lord Castlereagh and those employed by Arthur Henderson. No statesman of the old régime ever clothed a refusal in more courteous phrase. One might even imagine that the document of the Labor Government had been retouched by the hands of those stately gentlemen who were bred in the traditions of Talleyrand; only the lace and ruffles are lacking to carry us back over a century of history. Like Castlereagh, Henderson shares to the full the high ideals and the noble purposes of his correspondent. But, like Castlereagh, Henderson turns from these high planes of morals to deal with the rugged facts of present politics and view the scene across the Channel. With that detachment which is an Englishman's heritage the judgment of England then and now is that Continental Europe is not yet ripe for a political Federal union.

But the English detachment is by no means that of scientific disinterestedness. Britain has other interests than those of Continental Europe, and if the British Government did not in this instance wait to learn the opinion of the governments of the British Dominions, it was, perhaps, because there was no need to ask them their opinion as to the strengthening of the political ties of Britain itself with its Continental neighbors. Any such strengthening of the Continental orientation is almost inevitably to be regarded overseas as a strain upon the imperial ties. In the original scheme for a Pan-Europe, that of Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, this dilemma was met by frankly assigning to Great Britain an extra-European position. In that rather academic plan the British Empire was set apart from the Continent of Europe as if it were a continent of its own, as removed from the Pan-Europe organization as America itself. The British reply does not fall back upon these problems of empire, but they must have had some influence in the determination of the British point of view.

There is, however, a purely European reason for the British rejection of the Briand plan. If France thinks first in terms of politics, Britain, as an industrial and commercial nation, naturally thinks first in terms of economics; and the experience of post-war Europe has amply shown that more rapid progress in economic understanding comes by way of regional, or even bilateral, agreements between nations than by universal formulae.

It is true that the British note calls for a widening of the discussion of economic relations so that they "should be considered not one by one, nor in respect of isolated interests, but as a whole and from the wider viewpoint of the general interests involved," and that each nation should "be brought to realize the vital importance of their common interest and the advantage each will derive from measures of greater international solidarity." But this measure of agreement with the Briand plan should be read in relation to the actual economic policies and interests of the constituent nations.

French Press on British Reply.

It is a good omen that the French press has, upon the whole, taken the British reply so well. If there is any disappointment that Britain has not wholeheartedly followed the lead of France, it has not yet shown itself in the comments of French journalists. They might easily have fallen back upon the familiar theme of Britain's historic use of the balance of power on the Continent and its self-interest in preventing a concert of Europe in which it did not play the leading part.

The student of diplomatic history knows that neither in the Briand note nor in any of the replies is to be found their full explanation. For that one must understand not the phrases of Foreign Offices but the post-war history of Europe itself. M. Briand insists that there must be a political arrangement as a preliminary to the carrying out of economic plans. By this he obviously did not mean what the Germans took out of it—a revision of the Treaty of Versailles; nor, on the other hand, could he have meant what the Little Entente would wish to make of it, an additional guarantee of the status quo, which the Central Powers could not accept.

What he had in mind was doubtless something which lies part way between these two extremes. There could be no economic betterment so long as nationalism was running rampant in Europe, for nationalism cares less about material conditions than about self-expression. The new nations of Europe deliberately chose independence instead of prosperity when the choice was presented to them. Time and again in the post-war years the League of Nations has sought to make the governments of Eastern Europe accept more reasonable tariffs, more neighborly commercial arrangements and better conditions of transportation; but nationalism is a sort of tribal instinct which these people chose to satisfy rather than to accept the benefits of common sense in international relations. It is this nationalism which is the chief point of attack of M. Briand's plan and the post-war history of Europe amply justifies him in putting it to the fore. He would lessen the self-centred interest of the individual States by fastening their attention upon a larger political entity—that of the whole European political community.

The Pitfalls Ahead.

But there are two pitfalls ahead of this line of policy. One is that the call to surrender ever so little of their political prerogatives tends to accentuate their value in the eyes of the independent States which now exercise them; the other is that it raises at once the issue which the League of Nations left for history to work out, namely, the place of each nation vis-à-vis the central body.

Apparently part at least of the alleged hostility of members of the League of Nations Secretariat to the Briand plan is due to their feeling that the time has not yet come to measure the power of coordination as embodied in the League with the forces of nationalism still so largely dominant. That the League has done wonders in the short ten years of its existence no one can deny who knows the attitude of European governments toward it, but to force the issue at the present time either by the strengthening of the existing body or the erection of a parallel to it is not without danger to the process of historic growth.

Finally, it is of supreme interest to note that the one part of the Briand plan which touches the League of Nations is the one on which there is practical unanimity in the government replies. They will not have any rival organization to the existing League. M. Briand called for the organization of a permanent secretariat to deal with the purely European affairs. This he thought could be coordinated with the existing secretariat so as to relieve it of part of its duties without lessening its importance. But would it work out this way?

Duties of Union Secretariat.

The secretariat of a European federal union would have constantly before it matters calling for immediate action, which would almost inevitably need some administrative international organization more definitely political than the program of the existing secretariat. In short, if the federal union were to be a reality it would in course of time make Geneva an international capital of Europe. The student of government will at once recognize in this situation an almost inevitable conflict between the permanent bureaus of the Continental and the world-wide organization. It is hardly possible to conceive of two bureaus for international affairs working in Geneva in partial independence of each other without doing damage to one or the other.

The British note does not raise these matters of detail, but concentrates upon a broader issue. It sees the path toward European coherence by way of functional rather than structural reform and puts the emphasis upon economics instead of politics. The fact that tariffs have shown so little tendency to respond to the needs of business is, in its eyes, a less permanent obstacle than the prejudices that are concentrated in political nationalism. M. Briand argues that it is easier to find a more reasonable basis of national security than of international business.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR FROM TIMES READERS

CONGRESS DISCRETION LIMITED BY PURPOSE OF AMENDMENT

Agencies for Ratification of Constitution Changes Are Clearly Specified

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have followed with some interest the attempts of Mr. Henriques and Mr. Hazelton to persuade one another of the validity of their opposing contentions with regard to the constitutional validity of the Eighteenth Amendment. Perhaps one reason why neither completely converts the other is that neither of them has so far framed his argument with that clarity which is an essential prerequisite to persuasiveness.

Conversion in emotional matters, such as religion, may not depend on logic or be conditioned by facts; but in matters of jurisprudence both are fundamental. The beauty of this situation, with regard to the Eighteenth Amendment, is that if you once postulate the facts logic will take care of the ensuing inferences. What are the facts?

Individual Rights Involved.

1. The primary fact is that, as the Supreme Court of the United States conceded (156 U. S. 237), the individuals who constituted the "People of the United States" when this government was organized undertook to secure, by the Constitution, the rights each had possessed as a British freeman "such as his ancestors had inherited and defended since the days of Magna Charta." That is what the colonists had fought for and that is what the constitutional convention was trying to safeguard—individual rights.

2. On the other hand, each of these colonists belonged to a separate Colony having independent and sometimes different charter privileges and rights, but all of which were to start on separate careers of self-government as "independent States." (See Declaration of Independence.) Pending the dissolution of the Confederation, these States possessed all the governmental powers that were functioning before the new Federal Government was launched.

Alternative Was Provided.

3. Thus the constitutional convention in creating this new and very jealously regarded super-government was, on the one hand, taking from the governmental powers of the Colonies or States enough powers to vest in the new Federal Government functions and powers adequate to its national and international efficiency. On the other hand, they were subjecting themselves, as individuals (units of the aggregate "the People of the United States"), to the domination and control of this new government, in respect to the rights they had fought to secure from the British Crown.

4. Accordingly, in framing Article V of the Constitution, they framed it in the alternative, in respect to methods of ratification.

5. Since every word in that great document was a battlefield and every phrase a campaign, it is idle to suppose that this differentiation of methods of ratification was a mere idle expression. In view of the fact of the gentleman's agreement that was made pending the ratification of the original Constitution, namely, that there would be a Bill of Rights appended at the first possible opportunity (which was carried out by Mr. Madison at the First Congress), the framers of the Constitution provided for two contingencies. That is, there were two kinds of amendments that might arise—the first (this applies to the first seventeen amendments) was in case the Congress "deemed it necessary" to ask the several States to surrender, from the residue of governmental powers retained by them when the Federal Government was set up, additional governmental powers which otherwise would have remained in them and have been exercised by them.

The People Involved.

The other was in case the Congress "deemed it necessary" to ask the "People of the United States" to surrender to the dominion of the Federal Government certain more of those "rights" reserved to them. Such an amendment was the Eighteenth Amendment, for the first time in our history.

6. It is obvious that all of the first class of amendments would be submitted to the Legislatures for ratification, for they represented the States as distinct from the People of the United States.

It is equally obvious that an amendment asking the "People" to submit their personal rights to the further dominion of the Federal Government was of the second class and had to be submitted to conventions of the People for ratification.

This was not done in the case of the Eighteenth Amendment. No one thought of it. If they had thought of it and it had been so properly submitted, it being a war measure, it probably would have gone through with a whoop and no subsequent opposition to its validity could have been raised had it been so ratified.

Congress Made a Mistake.

As it was, Congress failed to realize that its "discretion" to propose one or the other alternative method was a discretion limited by the purpose of every proposed amendment. This failure destroyed the validity of the Eighteenth Amendment when ratified by the wrong agency.

7. Accordingly, if Mr. Henriques and Mr. Hazelton would try to get the People of the United States to consider this matter—not as Wet vs. Dry, and regardless of the effects of prohibition in promoting graft, or other considerations of that kind, and would ask the People of the United States to consider whether or not they are going to permit individual rights, which the War of the Revolution was fought to secure, to be bartered away, destroyed, or impaired by Legislatures who do not represent "the People of the United States," either collectively or distributively, and who never were constituted agents of "the People," we would have this issue presented upon a high plane of constitutionality, put in terms so simple that every individual could understand. The amendment then would necessarily be repealed. Then, if our friends who claim to be advocates of temperance would ask the People of the United States to ratify the same amendment resubmitted as intended by Article V in the alternative form planned by our fathers for just such a case as this, they would be doing the courageous and open and above-board thing.

Dare they try it on?

DISSIPATING A BOGY

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Not the least interesting feature of the Passion Play at Oberammergau is the influence of the sacred drama upon the lives of the children of the little Bavarian town. Excellence of personal character is an absolute requisite for participation, for them as well as for the grown-ups, and the dread of being debarred from the wonderful tableau is, according to a news item from Oberammergau, "of far better corrective influence than the bogies invented for most little folks."

Doubtless it is this vital discipline of ambition to be part of a great community festival that largely contributes to the extraordinary effect produced upon a visitor to Oberammergau. Who that has experienced it can forget the atmosphere of wholesome and natural goodness and reverence which almost tangibly bathes the little mountain town, setting it apart in memory from other places one has visited. The sweetness and simple purity of faces and manners seem nothing short of a miracle.

Then turn to a community where such ambition to be part of some great uniting function, and dread of exclusion, have too little influence. Discipline, or the desperate effort to maintain it, is left too much to impatient and harassed mothers and fathers. One has heard vexed parents shout to boys or girls in our streets, "Come here, or I'll murder you!"; "I'll whip you till there won't be a whole bone left in your body!" and similar ghastly and futile threats. The children have learned by experience the blustering weakness in all such dire declarations, which scarcely quicken perceptibly the pace of their obedience. And the bogies?—the awful beings, human, goblin or bestial—that will "get" the largely imperturbable youngsters! What a waste of breath, and, worse, what a poisoning by such petty deceit of the very wells of childhood character!

The other kind of discipline for American children is already operative to some degree, it is good to realize, through church pageants and public school dramas, block parties, playground activities, Scout hikes, field days and other fresh air outings, and all such democratic good times, which say to the child, "Be straight and clean and you shall share the happiness of all," instead of "Behave or you'll be thrashed!"

Oberammergau or New York, Tokyo or Chicago, children respond to the same fundamental stimuli everywhere. And the community that most generously increases that item of its budget which provides for this attractive discipline of its girls and boys will sooner or later achieve the richest inheritance of character, and, therefore, and inevitably, the lowest tax rate for that real "bogy" and most dread of all—Charities and Correction.

FOR STATE GAME REFUGES

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Referring to the question of conserving our wild life, in which all sportsmen and nature lovers are interested, it is encouraging to see what can be accomplished by a judicious program, effectively carried out, as shown by the report of the Pennsylvania Game Commission on last year's hunting season.

During the period in question in Pennsylvania, a State which a generation ago had been virtually shot out, there were killed some 22,000 deer, 450 bears, over 28,000 raccoons, nearly half a million squirrels, three and a half million rabbits, over 200,000 ruffed grouse, nearly 4,000 wild turkeys, more than 70,000 woodcock, besides shorebirds and waterfowl, and some 200,000 pheasants, an introduced species.

I have never seen a similar report issued by the State of New York and feel that it would be interesting to have the figures on the game killed within the State made public. It has also occurred to me that there is considerable land surrounding our larger reservoirs which could be utilized as game refuges.

In many places this is only a strip a few feet in width, but elsewhere there are promontories and drainage areas of respectable size, which must aggregate many thousands of acres, and which, being on the whole well forested with a mixed growth of hardwood and evergreen trees, would afford admirable cover for many of the species enumerated above, and possibly for some of our smaller furbearers.

Game has already begun to filter into some of these places, as I discovered on a recent hike, during which I ran across deer tracks on the borders of a reservoir within fifty miles of New York, and caught sight of a rabbit, besides seeing the telltale holes dug in the carpet of dead pine needles by the very useful and much maligned skunk. Gray squirrels, however, which are so abundant in our city parks, seemed completely missing, as were also all evidences of the presence of partridges or ruffed grouse.

If these areas were stocked with game I see no reason why they should not in a short time become a valuable adjunct to our present refugees, since they are fairly well patrolled, and the ban on shooting within them is well observed and enforced, so that the total outlay by the State would almost be covered by the cost of the stocking.

On the grounds of sanitation there can scarcely be any serious objection to the proposed measure, as any pollution of the water in the reservoirs which might result would be insignificant compared with that at present caused by gulls, water fowl, turtles and the like, and even this is so small as to be entirely negligible.

EXCERPTS FROM LETTERS

Backward Children.

As a New York taxpayer, I protest against dropping the backward children from Summer classes. I do consider it is unnecessary and unwise to push advanced children, whose brains should rest from competition and ambition during the holidays. The clever can meet the conditions of large classes during the school year; Summer work in small groups is the only hope for children who are bewildered month after month in the crowded classes of Winter.—MARGARET CHANLER ALDRICH, Barrytown, N. Y.

What This State Needs.

What New York really needs is a candidate (for Governor) of national stature whose stand for repeal (of the Eighteenth Amendment) is unquestioned and who will run on no other platform. Such a course will get not only hearty party support, but will attract all who hold the integrity of the Constitution above party allegiance and State sovereignty above Federal encroachment.—ALBERT J. ADAMS, New York.

More Artistry Called For.

There is a certain class of people interested in buying European-made products because they prefer individually made and artistically made goods. When these same goods are produced in America there is a tendency to standardization and lack of carefulness in detail, the American idea being to turn out flimsier factory-made goods for larger and quicker profit. * * * Instead of raising the tariff, why not try to rival our European neighbors in artistry?—L. P. BUSH, New York.

Proposing a New Holiday.

As August approaches we are reminded of the day two years ago when the Pact of Paris was signed by representatives of the fifteen leading nations by which war was abolished as an instrument of national policy. Since then * * * other nations, fifty-eight in all, have announced their adherence. Aug. 27 thus becomes a day to be celebrated as Pact Day. Last year it was appropriately observed in many places in Europe. Shall we, in whose country the pact originated, not evince as much enthusiasm?—LYDIA G. WENTWORTH, Brookline, Mass.

The Senate's Departed Glory.

Senator Johnson in one of his recent speeches criticizing the President for refusing to submit to the Senate data relating to the negotiation of the Treaty of London, referred to the probability that the former glory of the Senate, as he called it, had faded or paled into insignificance. In my opinion it has departed, and unless that body mends its ways and commends itself to the intelligence of the country by showing greater dignity in its proceedings, and more genuine statesmanship in its debates, it is not likely to be regained.—H. E. GREGORY, New York.

Better Quality Bread.

I am wholly in sympathy with the efforts of the American Bakers' Association to help the farmer by stimulating the sale of wheat, but it seems to me that the low consumption of bread is due mainly to the poor quality. The consumers' slogan is going to be "Better Bread" before the poor farmer will get any relief.—E. J. F., Hasbrouck Heights, N. J.

General Grant's Birthplace.

I read in THE TIMES that $109,000 has been raised toward a fund to restore and preserve the birthplace of General Robert E. Lee. * * * The house wherein General Ulysses S. Grant was born at Point Pleasant, Ohio, remains unrestored. * * * That humble habitation was scattered to the four winds some years ago in order to commercialize it at a world's fair.—CHAUNCEY D. C. DITMARS, New York.

UP TO AMERICAN BUSINESS

It Is the Only Power Big Enough to Eliminate Crime-Breeding Influences

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Making wages go further is almost the same as increasing them, and banks, insurance companies and large industrial companies can do this by building apartment houses for employes and fixing rents at interest on capital thus invested.

Wages are really America's most serious problem, overshadowing the tariff, overproduction, overcapitalization and similar much more widely discussed public subjects. The real truth is that American business and American Government fear to open up the wage subject, not knowing what it will lead to and how far the discussion will go.

Wages in some industries are so low as to be crime-breeding; yet to raise the wages of all America's 40,000,000 wage-earners by as little as $3 a week would obviously exactly wipe out the $6,000,000,000, which American business pays to stockholders every year in dividends.

A Problem for Business.

Wages, especially of unorganized labor, vary greatly with location, and also with individual businesses and particular employers. Information can often only be obtained by actually visiting each business concern and interviewing both employes and employer. This, in many cases, is not practical; and for this reason, statistics regarding present-day American wages must be regarded as incomplete.

Instead of pretending to ignore the wage problem, American business should face it and solve it before it causes still more serious trouble. After the last twelve years of constantly increasing nation-wide hold-ups, burglaries, robberies and embezzlements, every intelligent business man must realize that general economic conditions are behind all this multiplicity of crime.

A score of mind-warping, instinct-twisting influences are pressing down with intolerable weight and persistence upon the thoughts and emotions of thousands of our less fortunate American youths, making them believe that crime is more profitable and easier than work and gradually molding them into professional criminals.

These crime-breeding influences, almost all of which work together on each unfortunate youth, are: (1) Wretched homes in wretched slums; (2) wages too low to satisfy the normal cravings and instincts of youth and so low that crime seems more attractive and better-paying; (3) nullifying of sternly repressive sentences through misuse, by politicians, of the parole, probation and pardon system, which, of course, brings law into discredit and thus indirectly encourages crime; (4) failure of narrow-visioned Boards of Education to establish aggressive teaching of honesty and morality in public schools; (5) continual temptation of youths in business by careless money-handling methods of large corporations; (6) continual temptation of unemployed youths by the careless guarding of banks and business offices and of money and securities in transfer through the streets; (7) indifference of Federal, State and city governments to the vitally important employment problem; (8) crime-breeding examples set by unethical practices of the wealthy, successful and influential classes; (9) our demoralizing national trait of regarding "out-smarting" each other as entirely ethical and honorable; (10) too much immigration and too little deportation—and too much politics in both those important problems. Every American slum and even every American financial district is furtively patrolled by professional criminals to tempt honest youths to crime; (11) the moral and administrative confusion of the unenforceable prohibition law; (12) the seeming inability of the churches to convince all the nation's youth as to metaphysical theories which, whether right or wrong, certainly held previous generations of young Americans to a more self-repressed idealism.

Present-day American crime—four-fifths of which is committed by youths and gangsters between 16 and 27 years of age—can only be understood by realizing that all these many different crime-breeding influences are undermining the character of these unforunate American youths.

American business can do much to eliminate these crime-breeding influences. Indeed, American business, in my humble opinion, is the only influence in the nation today which is sufficiently powerful to eliminate them.

PAYING FOR OUR ROADS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In its editorial "Paying for the Roads," THE TIMES says: "Receipts from the gasoline tax will, it is expected, do away with the need of bond issues," and further "The old plan of requiring local governments to pay for the building and maintenance of roads was abandoned in 1898, even before the days of motors."

In order to accomplish one of the steps necessary to make the second statement a fact, our Mohawk Valley Towns Association group urge an immediate bond issue of $100,000,000 to create the first unit in a 15,000-mile farm-to-market State highway system.

In 1898 New York State's 80,000 miles of highway were a charge upon 932 townships, and today 50,000 miles are still cared for by the officers in these towns. These town officers have since 1898 transferred 20,000 miles of the total mileage to the care of sixty-two county engineers, as county roads, and placed 11,000 miles in the care of the State. This last mileage is all that is free from local government.

Our Mohawk Valley group desires to have the State take charge of 40,000 miles of highway, of which 15,000 miles shall be the main highways and 25,000 miles farm-to-market roads. We desire the remaining 40,000 miles to become county roads, in charge of county engineers, with State aid and supervision. In this way our feudal and uneconomic position of 1898 will pass to the position stated in your editorial.

To construct at an average cost of $7,000 a mile the first 15,000 miles of our 25,000-mile farm-to-market system, we favor the bond issue. The life of the bonds to be fifteen years, issued serially $10,000,000 a year, with an average life of seven and one-half years, incurring a total interest charge of $18,000,000 to $25,000,000, to pay for "doing it now" for these farm roads, which have waited twenty-five years to have the previous $100,000,000 bond issue expended on the main highways accommodating pleasure-seekers tourists and trucks.

Our 25,000 miles of farm-to-market roads are to be taken from those more remote highways upon which reside the fewest numbers of voters, who now constitute our most neglected class of citizens. These roads now serve the major part of our 30,000,000 acres of forest and farm lands. The 40,000 miles that are to come to the care of the counties are to be the ones having the most homes of resident town voters not residing on the main State system.

The State's 15,000 miles of two, three and four strip concrete are being built and reconstructed to carry the produce from our thirty millions of acres of land, accommodate our 12,600,000 residents and an untold number of tourists and trucks.

Such part of the 25,000 miles of farm-to-market roads as the State includes in this State system, which in the wealthy counties have been heretofore improved; the State, on taking into its care, is to compensate from the bond issue, the town or county for its value to the State of the road so included in the State system.

With the system completed our forest and farm areas will yield at least $3 an acre gain over their present returns; a new income of $90,000,000 annually for the farms.

But best of all, this transportation system would enable our State's portion of 20,000,000 rural residents, whom L. R. Alderman, adult educational specialist in the United States Bureau of Education, says are like the mountaineers of North Carolina but "functioning illiterates" with civilization at its lowest ebb, to become again parents in the best area for homes and for instilling character and ability into children with which to supply our cities with men and women of American birth and training.

DECISION OF COURT OF APPEALS HOLDS FOR HIGH TRADE ETHICS

Paying of Secret Commission Makes Seller and Buyers' Agent Liable

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Under the heading "Ethics Better This Time," THE TIMES recently published a news item quoting H. J. Kenner of the Better Business Bureau to the effect that business ethics have undergone a surprising improvement as compared to the methods used in the business depression of 1921-22.

According to Mr. Kenner, "a recession in business always brings with it the temptation to resort to questionable practices in order to keep up sales. The year there has been very little of the unethical sales methods which marked the depression of eight years ago."

It is a strange coincidence that the New York Court of Appeals should have discussed this very question recently and has just handed down a decision in the case of Donemar, Inc., vs. Molloy and Cafferky, reported in 252 New York 360. That case, in effect, decides that the law will compel the observance of high ethical standards in business in order to prevent the payment of secret bonuses or commissions to a buyer's agent in order to induce a sale. In fact, the decision goes further and holds that a closed transaction will be reopened and both the giver and the taker of the bonus compelled to respond in proper damages to the party aggrieved.

That case, as well as several others which have been passed upon by the New York Court of Appeals, is based upon Section 439 of the New York State penal law, which was enacted a comparatively short time ago.

Civil Penalties Also.

Briefly, the statute prescribes that whoever gives or offers to any agent or employe any gratuity, bonus or commission, without the knowledge and consent of the employer of such agent or employe, and with the intent to influence such employe's action in relation to his employer's business, is guilty of a crime, and is punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment for not more than a year. The statute further provides that the agent who joins in accepting the bribe is subject to the same penalties.

But the violation of this penal statute brings in its wake certain civil penalties. This was the question that was discussed in the instant case of Donemar, Inc., against Molloy and Cafferky. There the defendant Molloy had a claim against the plaintiff Donemar, Inc., for goods sold and delivered to it. A dispute arose and through the urging of the other defendant, Cafferky, who was the plaintiff's employe, the buyer was induced to pay the defendant Molloy $57,500 in full settlement of this disputed claim.

It later developed that the defendant Molloy had entered into a secret arrangement with the plaintiff's agent, Cafferky, to pay him a commission of approximately $5,000 if he would get Donemar, Inc., to settle the claim. It also learned that Molloy would have been glad to settle for the amount agreed upon, less the secret commission paid to plaintiff's agent. Upon learning these facts, plaintiff brought this suit against Molloy and Cafferky to recover the amount of the commission.

Jury Awarded 6 Cents.

In the trial court the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff for only 6 cents damages. This ruling was affirmed by the Appellate Division, on the theory that "as long as the jury found that the plaintiff had a fair return for every dollar it parted with, the defendants can keep the money paid in settlement with good conscience."

The Court of Appeals, in its opinion, however, looked at the question, not from the sordid standpoint of how much gain or loss there was to the plaintiff, but rather from the high ethical view that no person should be allowed to profit from a wrong even though the aggrieved party has suffered no financial damage.

Judge Pound, who wrote the opinion for the unanimous court, said: "The question of law is 'what is the position of a seller of property who pays a secret commission to a person whom he knows to be an agent of a buyer in effecting a settlement?' " The court then says it will adopt the English rule, which assumes that against the briber the true price of the goods as between him and the buyer will be taken to be less than the price actually paid by an amount at least equal to the amount of the bribe given

Lower Court Reversed.

While the court points out that the law will not go so far as to nullify the entire transaction, where the buyer has received and used the merchandise, yet if the seller bribes the buyer's agent, then the court will assume that the purchase price is loaded by the amount of the bribe. "The vendor has had and received money which belongs to the purchaser to the extent of the bribe, which neither the seller nor the unfaithful agent may in conscience and good morals retain. * * * It would be a strange miscarriage of justice if the corrupting seller and the corrupted agent of the buyer could retain the fruits of their crime and say that because the settlement was a fair one, the buyer sustained only nominal or no damages."

The decision, while highly important from a legal standpoint is even of greater importance because of its very interesting dissertation on high business standards. The case can profitably be read by every business man as a sermon on proper business practice and conduct. Indeed, it is another illustration of the adage that "Good morals and good law go hand in hand."

May Nullify Contract.

It is well for business men to know that the New York courts have even gone so far as to hold in the case of Sirkin vs. Fourteenth Street store, reported in 108 New York Supplement 830, that if the agent is bribed, the illegal act will taint all contracts of sale affected thereby, and the seller will not be permitted to recover the purchase price of his merchandise, even though the goods have been delivered to the buyer and used by him.

It might be argued that such a statute, with such drastic "teeth," is unconstitutional. However, the constitutionality of those "teeth" has been legally tested and approved in the case of People vs. Davis, 160 New York Supplement 769, where it was held that the law is not unconstitutional as denying equal protection of the law, or that it was an impairment of a contract obligation. On the contrary, the Davis case holds that Section 439 of the penal law is a proper exercise of the police power of the State in order to insure proper business conduct.

The law does advance; for to the age-old slogan of the common law, "caveat emptor," the twentieth century adds a new slogan, "caveat vendor"—particularly if he tries to force a sale by unethical business methods.

ANGLO-AMERICAN RELATIONS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As the guest of a great American manufacturing concern it seems to me only fitting that I should attempt to express my appreciation of the kindness and consideration that I have always met with here.

It was with pleasure and surprise that I first noticed the satisfactory relationship between employer and employe in this country. On all sides I saw a spirit of comradeship, a wish to cooperate and lend a helping hand, and a sincere desire to make a success of all undertakings. In no case has it ever come to my notice that an American employé has shown himself anything but a cheerful, high spirited and intelligent worker.

Now it seems to me as an idealist, and an intensely interested spectator of the last few years' events, that there is still room for further improvement in Anglo-American relations.

In England, and in this country too, there is still a certain small element whose outlook is narrowly nationalistic. Distances are so great and sources of information still so incomplete that these men are not yet able to understand one another's difficulties, nor, with open and thoughtful minds, to review their many common interests. I well remember being told by a distinguished Austrian mental specialist that when his patients came of their own accord, they were already half cured. In the same way I believe that when this element shows a desire for improvement this will then be already well under way.

After all both countries have a very similar civilization; it is possible to find copies of every phase of American life in England. There is, moreover, a powerful undercurrent of respect here for English society, for English methods and for English home and country life in general.

Moreover, America has not long been interested in foreign trade; it is here that the British can perhaps be of help with their experience and their advice as intermediators.

In short, there are so many points of contact, where the two peoples, so different and yet so alike, meet on common ground that we find them interwoven when they face the future and their destiny.

As friends and allies in a great undertaking we learned to respect each other's views when in sympathy and understanding we worked together for a cause which we believed was right and just. The two countries are the most powerful agent of peace and justice in the world today.

WOMEN IN NEW IRELAND

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Dr. Powdermaker is not "the first white woman ever to visit the island" of New Ireland. During the German rule in the island there were at least six German women there and since Australia took it over, any number of white women have been living there with their husbands on the cocoanut plantations. As a matter of fact, on the same steamer with Miss Powdermaker, from Kawieng to Sydney, there were at least three, and one of them, Mrs. Murray, had lived on New Ireland over six years to my knowledge.

When I first visited New Guinea in 1908, there were about sixty German women in the territory known as German New Guinea, and when war broke out this total had reached 180, I believe.

Furthermore, during my twenty-two years acquaintance, including over seven years constant living on the mainland, I have not seen any 3-year-old children smoking, although I have often looked for them.

NEVADA'S DUDE RANCHES.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I read with interest THE TIMES Magazine article about "Dude Ranches," but was sorry to see that nothing was said about the ranches in Nevada.

Dude ranches in Washoe County, around Reno, have been very popular for the past three of four years. It is a generally accepted fact that Westerners are cordial people, and when Reno became such a Mecca for Easterners we did all in our power to make it as attractive to outsiders as possible. There are now five or six dude ranches within easy motoring distance of Reno where "divorcing dudes" can spend their three months, or longer of they wish, in very pleasant surroundings.

Most of the dude ranches around here are owned by old ranchers—that is old in point of view of ownership—who have married Eastern women who have become enthralled with life in the West and with the honesty and uprightness of the men who owned the ranches.

ORIGIN OF BEAN-FEAST.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

With regard to the origin of the word "bean-feast," referred to in Topics of the Times as being shrouded in mystery, may an English visitor offer the following suggestion?

Field, or horse, beans used to be one of the main English farm crops and are still grown to a considerable extent. These beans, which I do not think are grown in the United States, are not suitable for human food and are used mainly as a horse feed. Their stimulating effect is known to all horse keepers. A lively horse is said to be "full of beans" and the same expression is used of children.

A bean-feast is therefore an extra good feed and owes its inception to one of those agricultural similies which go back to the times when the connection of everybody with the land was much more direct than it is in the present industrial era.

WEEK END DISPATCHES REVEALING THE TREND OF EVENTS IN EUROPE

EUROPE IS WATCHING OUR NEW NAVY PLAN

It Welcomes Ratification of Treaty and Parity as Check on Power of Britain.

FEDERATION AND LEAGUE

Geneva Discussion of Briand's Plan Expected to Hinge on German-French Accord.

By EDWIN L. JAMES.

The most important international event of the week has been the ratification, and signature by President Hoover, of the London naval treaty. There is small room for doubt that the agreement will shortly be approved finally by both Great Britain and Japan. This will put into effect the naval limitation provisions of the three great naval powers, regardless of the subsequent action by France and Italy on the other parts of the five-power agreement which apply to them as well.

Naval authorities in both Britain and Japan will now watch closely the naval building program of the United States. They will wish to see whether or not we carry out the $1,000,000,000 worth of building which the London agreement calls for if the United States is to have actual as well as paper parity with Britain by 1935. There is no little belief in some quarters in England that we will not complete that program. However, taking all the circumstances into consideration, it would appear a very good bet that the cruiser program laid down in the London pact will be completed by Washington, regardless of what may happen to the rest of the schedule.

Big Ships and the Next Parley.

A feature of the London treaty which attracts a great deal more attention in Europe than here is the supposition that it spells the end of the great capital ship as it has existed. It is argued that there are now in existence in the world sixty-one capital ships of less less than 20 years of age, which is commonly regarded, or at least has been regarded, as the age of usefulness of the big floating fortress. Because of the effects of the ten-year naval holiday provided in the Washington naval treaty, a great many of these ships will top the age limit during the five-year holiday prescribed in the London naval treaty, so that in 1935 there would be in existence only seventeen of the existing capital ships.

Inasmuch as it would take several years to build a capital ship, it is held to be clear that unless the 35,000-ton battleship is doomed, when the naval nations meet at their next disarmament conference in 1935, they must embark on a large program of construction of these craft costing from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 each. It is believed in Europe that this will not happen. And so the prevailing idea in England is that Mr. MacDonald in effect, if not in theory, has about won his proposal for the progressive abolition of the capital ship from the navies of the world.

This calculation might be slightly upset if the London treaty is interpreted as entitling the United States, Britain and Japan to keep in commission longer than twenty years the fifteen-fifteen-nine capital ships retained under the London agreement. But this effect would not be a dominant one, since the largest extension of age which has been suggested is five years.

Approval Well Received.

It will have been noted that the approval of the treaty by Washington is rather well received on the Continent of Europe. There are a good many nations in the Old World which have not the slightest objection to the end of British naval domination through the possession of the world's greatest navy. Rightly or wrongly, Continental diplomats see a weakening of British influence in Europe through our accession to naval parity with England; they figure that will attract more and more British attention and thus bring English interest and influence away from the Continent. As long as the MacDonald Government remains in power that may prove a good calculation. What efforts might be made by a new Conservative administration to regain British power on the Continent cannot of course be foretold.

Ever since the United States began actively aspiring to naval equality with Britain the Continent has never been hostile to our ambition. Where our diplomats got into difficulties was in trying to make Old World nations admit that for purely self-defense the largely self-contained United States needed as large a fleet as the British Empire scattered around the seven seas. That has never been agreed to. But it is nevertheless true that, taking our naval development as a piece of national business, the Continent of Europe sees no objections, nor does it see any loss for Continental nations. Rather a good many countries see advantages. This welcoming of our naval position would be even stronger if an agreement could be reached eliminating the possibility of a clash between American naval power and a hypothetical blockade by the League of Nations.

The League and the Federation.

It is quite apparent that the British diplomats who for patent political reasons do not desire the fruition of the plans of Foreign Minister Briand of France for a European federation have made a skillful move in picturing the new scheme as inimicable to the League of Nations. Had the British note to Briand confined itself to national British reasons it would have aroused far less interest than it did by pitting the League against the federation. It must be recalled that one-half the members of the League are outside of Europe. That makes it a good guess that when the Briand scheme comes up at Geneva in September, which will be at the same time that the meeting of the League Assembly gathers on the banks of Lake Leman the representatives of more than half a hundred nations, the opposition, which will be surely led by the British, will have recruits upon which Briand perhaps did not count when he launched his plan.

It stands to reason that the crux of the discussion of the Briand plan depends on the positions of France and Germany. Germany will ask her price of France for Teutonic cooperation. The German note has put this on the basis of the possible revision of terms of the peace treaties. That may or may not be a façade behind which the Germans are preparing a demand that if the French project goes very far toward execution, then France should admit that in a European federation she would no longer need for security her alliances with Poland, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and Belgium.

How far the September discussions get will probably depend on whether Paris and Berlin reach a prior understanding, or whether Berlin, along with Rome, will play alongside the British opposition. And meanwhile it would appear that the Secretariat of the League, headed by an Englishman noted for his sincere devotion to League interests, is doing all it can to call attention to the dangers of the weakening of the League by the erection of the machinery that Briand advocates.

Favored-Nation Tariff.

Bearing in mind that the strongest force back of the political idea of a European federation is the economic desire of Continental business leaders for a form of business union or cooperation in Europe, special interest attaches to the provision in the new Spanish tariff decree assessing higher duties on "extra-European" products, notably automobiles.

In the past, the Spanish, in common with other European nations have, in making tariff changes, faced the repititious American demand for most favored-nation treatment. We have asked the same rates as those given to any other nation, whether or not the rates in question represented a reciprocity arrangement. There has been no great successful resistance to our demand and in no case have duties been leveled specifically at American products.

That would be an unfriendly act not to be tolerated. But now comes the new Spanish formula of "extra-European" automobiles, which in this case means American automobiles almost exclusively. We get the same rates as any extra-European makers of cars. That we are practically, in this case, the only such makers of cars is an accident, of course. But it is an accident which may occur again. The question may be asked what analogy there is or is not between Spanish onions or American, or rather extra-European, automobiles.

France's Gold Supply.

France continues to increase her gold supply, which long ago took second place in the world, coming only after the American gold reserves. The Banque de France now has nearly $1,800,000,000 worth of gold in its vaults and the past week was marked by fresh shipments from New York and London to Paris. Paris is said to have gold credits in London and New York to a total of approximately $1,000,000,000. Bankers in both centres would like very much to know just how much more gold Paris will draw into the Banque de France.

Reports from Paris tell of criticism of the rise in prices blamed on the increase in paper money circulation, which now stands at about 73,000,000,000 francs. Yet an obscure paragraph says that gold refiners in London and Paris are booked up for weeks with French orders. The reason for this is that whereas the Banque de France is permitted by law to buy only pure gold, the gold now supplied by the Bank of England contains some alloy. When, a few months ago, because the supply of pure gold had run out or for other reasons, the Bank of England delivered to French buyers the alloyed gold, it was hoped in London that this would substantially decrease French buying because of the necessity of refining. However, if it is true, as reported, that London's gold refineries are increasing their capacities to deal with French business, the calculation made on behalf of the Old Lady of Threadneedle Street would appear to have worked badly.

The recovery of the gold position of France stands out as a monument to the work of Poincaré. It is only about five years ago that he had to borrow $200,000,000 to keep the franc from following the mark to oblivion.

When the tide turned, it ran with double speed. Not only did gold credits accrue to France through the repatriation of wealth sent abroad by Frenchmen when it seemed France faced a financial débâcle, but the stabilization of the French position attracted millions on millions of foreign investments in French Government and industrial securities. This double stream of gold credits to France is still running.

European Temperatures.

While the temperature in New York played tag with the century mark, Europe enjoyed Summer temperatures somewhat less than normal. In the middle of the week Paris and London ran from thirty to forty degrees lower than New York. While thousands were seeking relief in Central Park in the middle of the week, the weather spoiled an exhibition of dress reform for men in Hyde Park. It was too cold. But then, London weather was always in a class by itself.

Italy's Earthquake.

Whatever may be said about the attractions and detractions of Mussolini's system of Government, it will undoubtedly be admitted that the tight organization the Duce has given to his country will stand it in good stead in the earthquake disaster which has visited Italy. Every one expects that the necessary relief work will be well done, carried out with depatch and efficiency. Mussolini is a commander who is obeyed, and his strength will now stand Italy in good stead. And perhaps the earthquake will bring the most striking instance of cooperation between the Roman Government and the Vatican since the signing of the Concordat.

England's New Road Patrols Are Making Motorists Wary

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 23.—London has already tried and approved the American system of stop-and-go traffic lights, and now still another American traffic institution is being seen on the rounds hereabouts, namely, what in America is called a speed cop, but what is here designated as a "motor police patrol."

The police patrol has been developed greatly of late, and it has received the high approval of the police authorities acting under the Home Office. Some of them ride motor cars; others, American fashion, on motorcycles, operating under both county and suburb and borough authorities and their increasing activities on the main roads leading into the metropolitan area are only too well known to old offenders of the road.

BRITAIN CHERISHES HER OLD TRADITIONS

No Small Part of Her Economic Troubles Attributed to a Distrust of Change.

HARD LESSONS LEARNED

Now It Is Agreed That It Is Necessary to Choose What to Keep and What to Discard.

By FERDINAND KUHN Jr.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 24.—The times may be out of joint for England, but her traditions go on forever. Her foreign trade may dwindle, her industries may languish, but nothing can alter her customs of olden days nor impair the British people's delight in them.

It is not only tourists who are enjoying seeing some ancient medieval custom carried over into the twentieth century. Office workers hurrying to catch their evening trains for home would not miss seeing the company of scarlet-clad guardsmen which marches through the traffic each evening on the way to guard the King's money at the Bank of England. Conversely, the enormity of John Beckett's "rape of the mace" last week was not only in flouting the Speaker's authority, but in trampling on a cherished political tradition of 300 years.

Against these traditions considerations of utility and economy carry no weight and in many instances there is no reason why they should. This week, for example, crowds leaned from the parapets of the Thames bridges watching a little procession of boatmen in colored Jerseys row up the river bound for the quiet reaches above London. They were representatives of the medieval Dyers and Vintners' Companies which, with the King, own all swans on the Thames and they were on the annual "swan upping" expedition to mark the young birds. How much more business-like it would have been to travel by motor launch but how much less charming? And how much London's Lord Mayor would lose if instead of clattering through Fleet Street in a carriage with liveried footmen he would ride in an automobile with motorcycle police ahead of him?

Tradition and Trade.

It does not take a subtle psychologist to discover that all these pleasant survivals can be dangerous and that they can disarrange the field of business and finance. In twentieth century England the love of tradition is working in the wrong places. The report of the government commission of inquiry into the cotton industry reveals that Lancashire stagnating is partly because Lancashire is unwilling to break with tradition. The report mentions rationalization, group-marketing and modernization as crying needs of Britain's cotton industry and hints that unless the mill-owners abandon their nineteenth century traditions the government will step in with compulsory powers.

Until today the British coal industry was open to the same reproach. The tradition of small mines competing in a small way was too strong for the coal owners to abandon without a struggle. And the struggle went on for twelve bitter years after the war, until only now is the first thoroughgoing reorganization of the great industry being attempted by the new coal mines bill. That the bill has passed at all is a sign that tradition is not all powerful and that British industry is slowly breaking loose from the past.

Not all England's industrial leaders are hide-bound, and there is a healthy, vigorous movement within British industry in favor of keeping some of the old traditions in their proper places, but scrapping others altogether. The example of the United States and Germany and the influence of the progressive British Dominions are proving of enormous importance in bringing nineteenth century methods and ideas to an end.

Diplomatic Warning.

Returned Ambassadors like Sir Malcolm Robertson, former envoy to Argentina, utter plain words to British business men on the score of lax salesmanship abroad and cumbersome methods at home. The Federation of British Industries is helping to prod the more traditional industries into new ways of thinking. In a dozen directions in England it is apparent that the old die-hards in business as in politics are of less influence.

There are many observers in England who see her going through a far-reaching transformation—from the dominant England of before the war to a less dominant but still powerful England of tomorrow. It is a transformation which means discarding some of her traditions and keeping others. If in the process England can manage to discard her traditional conceptions in industry she can afford to send swan uppers in rowboats up the Thames and give her Lord Mayors carriage with footmen in gorgeous livery.

Rome Decrees a New Bridge for Venice, Linking the "Lagoon City" With Mainland

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, July 24.—The problem of communications between Venice and the mainland, which cause endless quarrels in artistic circles between traditionalists who maintained that the present railroad bridge is more than sufficient, and modernists who wish motor cars to have easy access to the lagoon city, have been definitely settled for better or for worse by the publication in the official gazette of a decree authorizing the expenditure in the next four years of about $4,500,000 for the construction of a new bridge.

This represents a considerable victory for the modernists, for the new bridge will provide accommodations for tramway tracks, an automobile road and a wide sidewalk for pedestrians. Seventy-five per cent of the expense is to be borne by the government, the remainder by the municipality and the province of Venice.

There are many who assert that the new bridge will completely spoil Venice, destroying its restful peacefulness, which is one of its most distinguished characteristics. It is difficult, however, to see how this can be. The bridge will lead only from the mainland to the outskirts of the city, where all traffic must necessarily cease because there are no streets in Venice wide enough to permit the passage of motor cars, let alone trolley cars. Those who oppose the project, however, say it is merely the thin end of a wedge and as soon as the bridge is built there will be an outcry to provide roads through the city to permit the traffic to reach St. Mark's Square. Whether this is so only the future can show.

GERMANS SEEK JOBS FOR 8,000 SOLDIERS

Expiring Enlistments in Reich's Army May Augment Ranks of the Unemployed.

By GUIDO ENDERIS.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, July 24.—German Government officials—especially the military authorities—are casting about for jobs for 8,000 members of the Reichswehr who will have completed their twelve-year-service term in the course of the next few months. These men—physically fit and thoroughly disciplined—by terms of their enlistment get the choice between demanding a fixed position in the Federal, State or municipal civil service or accepting a bonus of $2,000, which is allowed them on condition they are capable of making prudent use of it.

In 1931 about 13,000 Reichswehr members will be retired. Only a small percentage of these men will seek re-enlistment, as military authorities invariably discourage re-applications, both on the ground that a man who entered the army at the age of 20 has given it the best years of his life and also for the reason that fresh recruits are obviously desirable in order to give the greatest number of citizens an opportunity to enter the service under the system imposed by the Treaty of Versailles.

Serious Problem Raised.

This problem of re-establishing soldiers in civil life is now thrust on the government military authorities for the first time since the creation of Germany's modest professional army. With the regular army of unemployed hovering dangerously near the 3,000,000 mark, it presents fresh social complications in view of the existing labor situation and the government's determination to cut down its heavily over-staffed army of civil servants.

Compulsory service in the old imperial army was for two years. This precedent has been maintained in the new German army, the enlisted man receiving purely military training and practice for the first two years of his twelve years' service period. After that he is allowed to school himself for some civil professional branch while playing at soldiering, the Reichswehr maintaining a system of well-conducted institutions for instruction in civil administration, economics, agriculture or some less-complicated technical branches.

The soldier is permitted to choose his course, although he must submit to preliminary examination in order to demonstrate his adaptability and qualifications for the branch he selects. He receives expert and sympathetic counsel from his superior officers; and at the end of his twelve-year term he undergoes a final graduation examination, receiving official certification of his merits as a student in addition to his honorable discharge from the army. Armed with these diplomas, he sallies forth in search of a job unless he elects to accept the bonus.

Must Prove Fitness.

If he prefers the $2,000, proposing to establish himself as a truck gardener, petty shopkeeper or in some other respectable calling, he must demonstrate his moral and business aptitude before the money is handed over to him. If he prefers a regular salaried job and none worthy of his competency is forthcoming, despite his military credentials, he receives two-thirds of his soldier's pay for his first workless year, one-half for his second and one-third for another year of unemployment. A non-commissioned officer in the Reichswehr receives about $60 a month.

Despite the none too auspicious prospects attaching to a twelve-year enlistment in the new German Army, the number of applicants continues about ten times greater than the 6,000 recruits required each year to bring the Reichswehr up to the 100,000 level allowed to Germany.

MOSCOW IGNORES FISH COMMISSION

Investigations of Communists Here Barely Mentioned by the Soviet Press.

By WALTER DURANTY.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, July 23.—Paradoxically enough the Fish commission and the investigation of Communist activities in the United States leaves Moscow cold and apparently disinterested, although the daily press flames with passionate denunciations of "the Fascist terror" in Hungary, Rumania, Poland and Finland. There is none of this about the United States, nothing save a curt single head, "Labor-Fascists Busy." A brief cable from New York describes some outburst by an official of the American Federation of Labor, and another tells of "Capitalist America Alarmed by Red Pioneers," relating to some one else who has denounced "the pioneer menace" in New York's public schools.

Grover Whalen got a contemptuous cartoon when he retired to Wanamaker's, showing him peddling wares labeled "fake documents—policemen's hardwood clubs—tear gas—spurious Bolshevist bombs." Beyond that—silence, which seems to proceed from indifference rather than from caution.

Stalin and other speakers at the recent party convention did not hesitate to make unpleasant remarks about the "decay" of American capitalism, or to stress the importance of the rôle that might and should be played by the American Communist party in the present juncture.

Pravda devoted two whole columns to the instruction and admonition of American Communists. But the Fish investigation, in theatrical parlance, "is a flop" as far as Moscow is concerned, and individual Communists with whom your correspondent talked share the apathy displayed by the press.

Just why this is the case it is difficult to explain. One might venture to suggest that Moscow does not think much of American Communists anyway, despite the sops of eloquence—not unmixed with reproof—flung at them during the convention. Although Pravda declared the American party now numbers 15,000 "stoical proletarian battlers" and that Lovestone, Pepper & Co. are now hiding their heads in defeat, one may question whether such an expressed optimism is wholly sincere or justified by the facts.

American Renegades.

It is not beyond the bounds of possibility—though of course no one here would ever admit it—that some important Moscow Communists have a sneaking idea that Mr. Lovestone, although duly excommunicated for contumacy, may know a good deal about conditions in the United States, and that although he had the misfortune to become a casualty in the highly vital struggle between Bukharin and the Kremlin in high Communist International circles, it is just possible that he was right in imagining that the economic depression has not yet strewn American streets and countrysides with corpses of the starving proletariat.

It is possible, too, that Moscow thinks a little dose of martyrdom would not be bad for the American Communist party and is loth to say anything that might intimidate the Fish commission and cause it to stay its hand. Or perhaps again, Moscow does not take the Fish commission seriously, either, and happens to know there are certain elections to be held in the United States next November.

And, finally, it is worth supposing that Moscow has other and more important fishes of its own to fry. One thing is certain among all these hypotheses: American economic depression is far more interesting to Moscow as a world event affecting world capitalism in general and European capitalism in particular than in its relation to opportunities it may offer to the American Communist party, which at best is a puny plant grafted over with heretic shoots.

Stalin emphasized the American crisis for the simple, human reason that he had prophesied its advent during the tensest moment of his strife with the "Right" adversaries in the Central Committee—at a moment, indeed, when it seemed remote, if not improbable. To use an unworthy metaphor, he "doped it out" beforehand from the books of Marx and Lenin and bet on it against long odds ond won.

The Kremlin's Attitude.

Other Kremlin spokesmen who would have played the same bet, naturally spoke the same way. But neither Stalin nor his followers expected the American capitalists—however shaken by unhappy tidings from Wall Street—to be ready to abdicate the power to the American Communist party, or even be really alarmed thereby. One may not like or admire the Kremlin rulers, but it is silly to suppose they are fools. And hardly less silly is it to forget that here, as elsewhere, internal—especially intraparty—affairs are, after all, the things that count the most.

A visitor from Pluto—as The Sunday TIMES "By-Products" columnist puts it—might be entertained by "just a position of opposite conceptions" implied in the Soviet attitude toward the Kurdish revolt and the British attitude toward the trouble in India. Soviet headlines run, "Seduced by Notorious British Spy, Colonel Lawrence, Kurdish Malcontents Rebel Against the Turkish State," and "North Indian Tribes Raise the Flag of Freedom." To which London tautologically replies, "Kurdish War of Independence," and "Red Agitators Foment Trouble on Northwest Indian Frontier." Perhaps—so strange is life—both of them are right.

Turks Still Fight on Around Mount Ararat To Subdue Kurds, While Wild Rumors Surge

By J. W. COLLINS.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ISTANBUL, July 23.—Fighting between Turks and Kurds has gone on steadily in the past fortnight without either side gaining complete victory, although the Turks assert they have more or less subdued the rebels. At first the Kurds had matters their own way, and their tribes who had entered Turkey from Persia joined the Kurds living in Turkey. The Kurds took Arjish, a small town north of Lake Vin, and tried to cut the road leading to the town of Van. Turkish troops drove them out of Arjish and it is said that casualties among the Kurds exceeded 3,000. Then the Kurds returned on Mount Ararat and fierce combats are now taking place.

Salih Pasha is commanding the Turkish Army and it is understood that he has at his disposal two army corps, a large force of gendarmes and several squadrons of airplanes. It is also said that many peasants leaving Kurdistan have offered their services to the government and that the total Turkish forces number about 25,000. But it is believed that the Kurds are less numerous and it is estimated that they cannot muster more than 15,000 rifles. Kurdish women, however, are taking part in the struggle, and many of them are expert shots.

The rest of Turkey remains quiet and the government is therefore able to dispatch reinforcements to Kurdistan if it desires.

As this is the second Kurdish insurrection in the space of five years, it is certain that the government will not spare any efforts to crush it. Yesterday it was announced that near Van 200 villages had been burned and from other parts of Kurdistan come similar stories. Feeling is running very high among both Turks and Kurds, and few prisoners are being taken. Turks say the Kurds subjected their prisoners to terrible tortures before killing them, and while this is not to be doubted, it is improbable that captured Kurds receive good treatment.

The Kurdish movement apparently has the backing of a certain number of Turks who fled from Turkey when the Kemalist Government came into power in 1923. Recently three Turkish officers were known to be fighting alongside the Kurds and it is suspected that there were others.

AUSTRIA IS COLD TO THE HAPSBURGS

Public Interest Lacking Even in the Proposed Monument to Francis Joseph.

EMPEROR'S LIFE STUDIED

Material Dug Up for New Biography Reveals Greatest of Dynasty a Very Human Monarch.

By EMIL VADNEY.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

VIENNA, July 23.—A brief newspaper paragraph announced a few days ago that as it had been found impossible to obtain by public subscription enough money to celebrate on Aug. 18 the 100th anniversary of the birthday of the Emperor Francis Joseph by the erection of a monument, a simple memorial tablet would instead be unveiled in the Votive Church at Vienna. This announcement served, as nothing else could, to show how futile are the hopes of a monarchical restoration in Austria and how definitely and completely the Hapsburgs, in Austria at least, have become a thing of the past. The Republic has installed itself in their castles, presents open-air plays in their private garden, peoples their apartments with clerks and stenographers, allows tobacco and confectionery shops to carry on business even in the very seat of imperial pomp and power—the Hofburg. Austrian aristocracy, which owes so much to the greatest of the Hapsburgs, has no money to waste on the celebration of his centenary, which will instead be left, it would appear, largely to the publishers.

A whole series of new volumes is already being issued or is in the press concerning themselves with the life story of the man who for nearly sixty years determined almost alone the destinies of his great empire. Every phase of his daily life as man and emperor, or his method of ruling and ways of thinking, is being set down by biographers who in some cases were the emperor's contemporaries and companions.

A More Human Picture.

For their purposes the Vienna State archives have been newly dredged and more careful sifting of available material has disclosed much that is new and unexpected. Perhaps the Emperor will not suffer in that it has been left to publishers to honor his memory, for their painstaking investigations have brought to light a new and intensely more human man, and the biography may be more enduring than a monument of stone. The picture that posterity and even contemporaries of his later years had painted of him and to which authority had been given by a host of biographies and memoirs, was compounded of iron conscientiousness and devotion to duty, a narrow rigidity and hatred of all that was modern—including telephones, elevators and automobiles. It was a picture of an old man who had survived his time. But it is clear from new material that for perhaps the greater part of his long life there had been another and a different Franz Joseph.

Family letters made available in State archives and now being published are in striking contrast to the brief, dry notes which characterized the correspondence of his later years. They are letters full of feeling, of originality, even of the humor that was to desert him after decades of care and misfortune. During the war with France and Italy in 1859 the Emperor found time to write to his children about their pet dog and to admonish young Crown Prince Rudolph not to eat too much or pull his sister's hair. Contemporary court gossip about a lack of affection between Franz Joseph and his Empress is discounted by tender expressions of affection for her which fill his letters to his mother.

In private letters he characterized Germany's behavior to France in 1870 as infamous and hoped that France would outlast Prussia in the ensuing conflict. After Austria's defeat by Prussia at Königgrätz he wrote to his mother: "We have fallen victims to infamy and treachery," but even while he was still reading reports that told of the defeat and annihilation of his army, he wrote to his children, then in Budapest, letters full of their accustomed tenderness. The Empress added a postscript: "He is so calm and brave but suffers frightfully. Your Mamma."

Latter comes the letter of congratulation to Crown Prince Rudolph on the attainment his 18th birthday—May God grant you better days than I have known—followed by intimate wishes for luck and happiness, and pride over the talent of his son. Perhaps it was because these wishes were disappointed that Franz Joseph's letters were later to dry and harden into little more than politely worded comments on the weather.

HOSPITAL IN CRIMEA.

Children's Institution to Open Soon as Paxton Hibben Memorial.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MOSCOW, July 24.—A children's hospital in the Crimea to perpetuate the name of the American radical Paxton Hibben, who raised large sums for relief in the 1921 famine, will soon be opened at Artek, near Yalta, with 150 beds in a new building on the 300-square-kilometer estate of a former noble.

The American members of the Hibben Memorial Committee, Mark Dix and Isaac MacBride, have just left Moscow for Artek to make final arrangements.

It is hoped that the funds collected by the American committee will maintain not only a hospital, but also a "children's health village" or convalescent tent colony, to be developed in the surrounding pine woods.

New Lighting Beautifies Paris.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 24.—A new aspect, which would astonish even their designers, has been given to beautiful Paris buildings this year by extraordinary illuminations in the celebration of holidays and centenary fêtes. From time immemorial it has been customary to outline buildings with lights, but, under the direction of Fernand Jacopozzi, electrical engineer, a new method has been developed for flooding public edifices with diffused light from a dozen powerful projectors, somewhat as is done in the case of New York skyscrapers.

PARIS SEES PLAYS ON AN OLD STAGE

The Ancient Arenes de Lutece, a Relic of Roman Times, Is Used Once More.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 23.—As befitting a setting of ancient Grecian and Roman drama, the Arenes de Lutèce, Gallo-Roman remains in the heart of Paris, are being used for outdoor performances this Summer by Théâtre Française and the Odéon players. Students of a dramatic society also presented Racine's "Andromaque" with the assistance of several members of the Odéon troupe, and this organization was so encouraged by the box office-success of their effort that a series of performances for August is now planned.

Critics in the French press testify to the excellence of the acoustics of the ancient arena. Ample seating accommodations close to the stage are provided by placing chairs in the centre enclosure, but many in the audiences show their appreciation of the old theatre's historical background by sitting on its hard original stone steps. Scenic efforts are of the simplest character, natural verdure serving as back drops for the stage.

It is a common sight during performances to see people leaning out of the windows of buildings overlooking the arena and straining their ears to hear the players' voices. Some can even be seen following the play by reading texts.

ISTANBUL ENJOYS A LIVELY SUMMER

Cabarets Remain Open Until Dawn and Prosper Despite the Economic Crisis.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ISTANBUL, July 23.—While Kurds are fighting Turks in faraway Kurdistan, citizens of Istanbul continue to lead their ordinary lives and enjoy to the full a wonderful Summer. Constantinople, to give it its old name, has always been famed for its marvelous climate, and from May until October there is an endless succession of blue, sunny days and balmy starlit nights.

Istanbul nights have a charm of their own. Cutting right through the middle of the city is the Bosporus which, though churned by winds and currents by day, is invariably placid at night. Its waters flow for twenty miles from the Black Sea to the entrance of the Sea of Marmora, with faintly lighted wooden houses and a few imposing yalis (châteaus) showing up on each bank. Gaily decorated small steamers and rowing boats pass quietly down with men and women crooning old Turkish songs. Occasionally a big ship bound for Russian or Balkan countries hoots its way noisily through.

Night Watchmen.

On land there is a diversity of sounds. In old quarters of Stamboul, which is almost exclusively inhabited by Turks, the streets are deserted and every one is in bed at 10 o'clock. The only sounds to be heard are made by watchmen going their rounds, thumping their long wooden sticks on the ground, and muezzins calling the faithful to prayer from the minarets.

Meanwhile night life in Pera is starting, and during Summer goes on until dawn. Pera has always been renowned for its cabarets, its cafés and other night resorts, and even today, when the city is passing through a severe economic crisis, the same old scenes of gayety and riotous amusement are to be found. The only difference is that people who frequent these night resorts have changed.

Formerly it was the rich Greeks, Armenians and Levantines, the foreigners who spent money lavishly every night. Now it is the Turks who have taken their places, with odd tourists, usually Anglo-Saxon, as spectators. Many of these cabarets are in the open air and provide an excellent variety show free of charge. Drinks are relied on for profit, and as whisky costs $1 a glass, champagne $15 a bottle, profits are not difficult.

VIEWS OF EUROPE: THE NEW GERMANY AND ITS POLITICAL PARTIES

REICHSTAG EXPECTS NEW GROUP IN FALL

A Conservative Faction Under Count Westarp to Make Bid for Power in Elections.

REPUBLICANISM SURVIVES

Despite a Maze of Differing Ideals the New Reich Is Now Solidly Founded.

The article appearing below is the second of a series on "The New Germany," by the editor-in-chief of the Vossische Zeitung. It deals vividly with the growth of republicanism, the maze of political parties, and shows how their conflicting aims led to the recent crisis in the Reichstag.

By GEORG BERNHARD.

From the armistice up to the acceptance of the Young plan the fight over reparations has completely dominated German politics. The reparations problem has been treated as an economic one in Germany only by a very small number of clear heads. For most Germans, it was a political question and, indeed, an internal political question. That provision in the Treaty of Versailles which sought to have Germany pay unlimited sums has had a catastrophic effect on the whole of German political life. Pessimism swept through the mass of the population. It was felt that Germany was eternally to be the debtor-servant of the foreigner.

Only very gradually did the idea of a so-called policy of fulfillment begin to grow. Rathenau and Wirth believed in it, holding that Germany must first try to fulfill her contracts in order to prove gradually that reparations were a huge economic problem, in the intelligent settlement of which every nation receiving payments was just as interested as Germany. Rathenau was also shot and Wirth was succeeded by Chancellor Cuno. Cuno personally favored a sensible understanding, but succumbed to the nationalistic elements, led by Helfferich. Finally came the cessation of reparation deliveries, which led to the occupation of the Ruhr and the Ruhr war, and gave fresh impetus to the scarcely checked inflation which finally destroyed the rest of the value of the German currency.

Stresemann's Guiding Genius.

Stresemann was the first to succeed in guiding German politics into the path of understanding, but only after the complete destruction of German resistance. The Dawes agreement, which for the first time intelligently tried to remove the reparations question from the field of politics and to appeal to economic commonsense, placed Stresemann's policy on a firm basis. It is a moot point whether the Dawes plan alone would have sufficed to give German politics whatever of peace and firmness it has found in the past years without the strong personality which Gustav Stresemann more and more clearly revealed.

Under German conditions Stresemann may well be considered a political prodigy. He is the first politician of outstanding dimensions which the revolution has produced. Rathenau and Erzberger were certainly not without political instinct, but they lacked the steady line and the clarity of idea of Stresemann in all the schemes they developed. Rathenau was a man with a wealth of ideas and international orientation. But Stresemann combined a talent for statesmanship with a clear foresight and great originality. Above all, he was a master of domestic politics, a man who knew how to rule the masses by his eloquence and one who understood the psychology of the German middle class from which he, as the son of a small inkeeper, came.

He was, too, a brilliant party leader. He knew that one cannot always march straight ahead in politics, that one must sometimes follow the voice of the masses for a little way in order to bring them finally to the goal one had in mind. And his personal charm made itself felt internationally. He was not a genius, but he was a man of strong political intuition, of penetrating understanding and of very great talent. Only his statecraft could have sufficiently influenced German politics so as to make it possible for him to go as Foreign Minister to Geneva, Thoiry and The Hague.

The Young Plan.

The Young plan, which grew out of the Dawes plan and made the reparations question a problem in mathematics whose final solution must be found through addition, subtraction and reckoning of interest, is the result of that "policy of fulfillment" which Stresemann took over from Wirth and to which he added the special note of Franco-German understanding. Great as his services in foreign politics were, however, his internal political accomplishments were much greater.

Stresemann brought his own party, which at first was thoroughly monarchistic in its convictions and refused to recognize the republican black, red and gold flag, onto republican ground. In this way he indirectly caused the republican idea to spread in ever-widening circles through the ranks of the Nationalist party. How strongly republican in its sentiments the Nationalist party was was first shown when the newspaper king, Hugenberg, after buying up most of the German newspapers, set himself to work to get the party machine of the Nationalists into his hands and resurrect the monarchistic faith. Supported by his newspapers, he sought to drive the Nationalists into the arms of the National Socialists. One wing of the party separated from the rest. Great numbers of the country folk in particular wanted to make their peace with the republic. And the Bruening Cabinet, which was supported in part by this rebel wing of the Nationalists, was the best proof of the consolidation of republicanism.

The largest party in the Reichstag was the Social-Democratic. Its philosophy of life is the Marxian bible. And because the party does not interpret its bible consistently it is paralleled by the Radical Communist party, whose Reichstag members contemptuously regard their Social-Democratic colleagues as bourgeois Marxists. Since the Social-Democratic party has supplied a number of Cabinets with Ministers and has held the Chancellorship more than once, it exhibits a strong feeling of responsibility for the republic and has therefore tended to become an ever purer radical labor party whose chief support is found among trade unions, office workers' associations, societies of lower and middle grade civil servants and a certain class of intellectuals.

The Late Dr. Gustav Stresemann.

The second party was the German National People's party (the Nationalists). It grew out of the remains of the old Prussian Conservative party at the time of the revolution and has well understood how to attract the majority of small bourgeoisie, who were interested in the old order, such as, for instance, the families of small officials, certain business circles, who were formerly purveyors to the courts of big and little principalities, members of imperial officers' families, orthodox Protestant circles and, above all, the aristocracy and the agrarian organizations.

Party of the Catholics.

The Centrists were the third party in point of size, a Catholic party, formed in the days of the empire when Bismarck made his unfortunate attempt to challenge the Pope. It was an Opposition party and had never quite lost that character during the empire. After the collapse, this party in conjunction with the Social-Democrats and the Democrats took over the leadership of the new republic. It concluded and united through the tie of the Catholic faith every class of society from the Catholic members of the aristocracy to the Christian trade unions. Its political policies have been extremely dexterous. It has formed the Right wing in government coalition of the left and has been the Left wing in coalitions standing more to the right. A wit once compared the Centrist party to the joker in poker with which one can do whatever seems most favorable to the situation of the moment.

The Democratic party developed after the revolution out of the former Freethinking and Progressive party plus a number of men of the left inclinations who were, however, not Social Democrats. In the National Assembly at Weimar this party had seventy-five mandates out of 490 and numbered the best bourgeois heads among its members. Walter Rathenau belonged to this party. The importance of the Democratic party, however, has waned with the shrinking of the number of mandates it holds. Some of its members have moved to the left to join the Social-Democrats, and it suffered a still more serious loss through the founding of the Economic party of the middle class. This Economic party has consciously negatived all political principles and seeks to represent the point of view of the small shopkeepers and manufacturers in a spirit of brutal egotims.

The Party of Stresemann.

The foundation of the Democratic party showed the doctrinaire convictions of the German politician to perfection. It tried to exclude from its ranks all those who had supported an offensive policy during the war, especially those who had favored U-boat warfare. Gustav Stresemann was denied admission to the party on these grounds. They wanted him as a party member, but they felt he ought not to have any measure of leadership for an indefinite time. Stresemann quickly decided to assemble the remains of the old National Liberal party which had not joined the Nationalists and to form the German People's party. This party definitely represented big business and owed its success solely to the leadership and growing popularity of Stresemann.

The German party system has recently undergone further expansion. During the final voting on the government's emergency bills, which resulted in the dissolution of the Reichstag on July 18, the German National People's party finally blew up. Twenty-nine of its Deputies under the leadership of Count Westarp have definitely separated themselves from Dr. Hugenberg, the party's leader.

It was chiefly the big landowners, who, led by Count Westarp, sought separation from Hugenberg. They demanded a policy of practical relief for German farmers who were also suffering because of the world agricultural crisis. Hugenberg's political tenets and ideals on the other hand appeal strongly to the crabbedness of many Germans; his policy toward the new State is one of absolute negation, and he does not for a moment shrink from allying himself with the ultra-radical elements of the Right parties who are openly propagating the violent overthrow of the State.

Fifteen Have Quit Reichstag.

Because of this anti-constitutional intransigeance, fifteen Deputies quit his Reichstag group some months ago. They were led by Captain Gottfried Treviranus, a young former naval officer who began his political career as a spellbinder for Hugenberg, but who meanwhile developed into a confessed adherent of the republican form of government. He has the confidence of von Hindenburg and at the latter's suggestion Chancellor Bruening made Treviranus Minister for the Occupied Areas when he organized his Cabinet last Spring. Treviranus appears to be less concerned about occupied zones than about giving Bruening political counsel, and it has long been an open secret that his avowed purpose was disruption of Hugenberg's Nationalist party.

He now has achieved his ambition, and with Count Westarp will organize a new Conservative party which will probably be represented in the new Reichstag by fifty Deputies. It is yet too early to predict the political and Parliamentary chances of this new party, because it must still be demonstrated whether Hugenberg's party machine proves superior to the powerful organization of Agrarians, whose financial and other resources will be on the side of Westarp and Treviranus.

ALL FRANCE FIRED BY BICYCLE RACE

Crowds Eagerly Await Returns and Gather in the Streets as the Pedalers Pass.

CONTEST LASTS A MONTH

Competitors From Several Nations Ride Over the Countryside and Rivalry Is Keen.

By P. J. PHILIP.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 24.—No sporting event rouses among the French public such passionate interest as the annual bicycle race around the whole circumference of the country, which is now again nearing its close. Its interest is infectious. People who one would never dream could get excited about any such event suddenly become helplessly addicted to buying evening newspapers to see who has won the day's race. Crowds of thousands stand every day before newspaper offices waiting for the announcement. French newspapers themselves, which habitually never spend a penny on the gathering of news, lavish money on automobiles for their correspondents following the race and on telephone calls, while writers vie with each other as at no other time to produce graphic descriptions of this modern gladiatorial show.

It is, indeed, gladiatorial. There is nothing that men do in any sport which can compare with this "tour de France" in downright zeal and effort. There is no marathon runner who has ever stood the strain these men undergo day after day. Golf championships are child's play to them. The Davis Cup is a mere half-hour's exhibition in dancing.

A Test of Endurance.

They started out one morning before dawn about 100 strong, these gladiators of the road, at the beginning of July from Paris to Le Havre. From there, with only occasionally a day's rest, they have been pedaling up hill and down dale over good roads and bad roads, round the rugged Brittany coast, down the long sandy western littoral, up the tremendous slopes of the Pyrenees, over the Alps and now they are nearing their last laps—only sixty of them left—to the north coast and so back to Paris. The race takes a whole month and is unique. Of course riders are professionals, like baseball players. But that does not detract from the public worship of favorites like Andre Léducu and Charles Pel. These two are heroes to every French small boy and the most blasé newspaper reader can scarcely escape from excited interest in the race as it goes on and as it is written up by French reporters.

An International Struggle.

It is international, too, and that gives it added interest. The struggle has been almost from the start between the French and the Italians. The latter had two heroes, Guerra and Binda. Against them it has been with difficulty that the French have been able to hold their own. Never, however, was an international match fought with such admirable sportsmanship. When Binda found himself robbed of his chance by a series of accidents and flat tires he threw himself into the task of helping his countryman, setting the pace day after day until forced to retire. The race, after the tenth day, seemed to lie between Guerra and the Frenchman, Léducu.

The outcome of this struggle, in which falls are frequent and accidents an everyday occurrence, can never be foretold. At any moment the leader may be delayed. That was what happened to Léducu on Monday. First a puncture delayed him. When he had replaced a tire he started off at a tremendous pace up and down the long hills in the Alps trying to overtake his rival. Taking risks every minute, he fell at a corner, hurting himself and twisting a pedal. Time was lost in repairs. The overwrought and exhausted Frenchman broke down sobbing. The moment was one of the most dramatic of the whole race. Half of his teammates immediately started off in pursuit of Guerra so as to set the pace for him and, if possible, slow down his lead. The other half gathered around him, encouraging him, and with enthusiasm it is recorded by the French press that it was an Italian newspaper man who first picked him up when he fell and was foremost in bathing his wounds and encouraging him to keep on. With new vigor and a new pedal he started off. Soon news came back that Guerra was only five minutes ahead, then two minutes, then one minute.

Day's Run Is 100 Miles.

Each day's stage is 100 miles at least, sometimes much more. Seventeen days of such effort is enough to wear out the courage of any man and for the moment Léducu, who has worn out the leaders almost since the start, seemed beaten. But the encouragement of his comrades kept him to it. In a tremendous spurt he retook his place, beating the Italian, Belgian and German riders in a final sprint.

It is no exaggeration to say that the greatest interest of millions of people in this country lies every day in the question as to whether he will keep it. His time on Tuesday was 126 hours and 25 minutes, 23 seconds against 126 hours 41 minutes and a half second for Guerra. Another Frenchman, Magne, and a Belgian, Demuysere, are within 5 minutes later. There is still a long stretch from Delfort to the coast and back to Paris to be run, with all its possibility of accident and failing strength and courage.

DUBLIN DAIL ACTS ON GAMBLING EVILS

New Law Is Intended to Curb a Craze Which Has Spread to All Classes.

By M. G. PALMER.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

DUBLIN, July 23.—The Dail assembled for one solitary sitting last week to deal with several important bills returned after amendment in the Senate. The opportunity was taken to give a formal first reading to the belated measure for reform of the betting laws, as grave evils have followed in the wake of the act passed in 1926 which sanctioned betting on licensed bookmakers' premises.

The gambling craze has spread alarmingly among all classes, even down to those receiving the unemployment dole. It is also getting a firm grip on the small farming folk and has even become a lucrative branch of the general dealer's business in the country districts. One small town of 8,000 inhabitants possesses thirteen betting saloons all doing a brisk trade.

In many areas there are a greater number of betting shops than post-offices. Dublin alone has 180, frequented mostly by the very poor, who leave bookmakers no less than $630,000 annually before these gentry can make any profit. It is stated in the report of the Parliamentary committee which forms the basis of the new bill that "gambling in the Free State has become a greater menace than drink, and its results are demoralizing, disorderly, uneconomic, thriftless."

Remedies Proposed.

Though the text of the amendment measures has not yet been published, it is forecast that it provides for a substantial reduction in the number of betting saloons, restricting them in metropolitan centres to a ratio of one to every 5,000 of population, and in small towns one to every 2,000 inhabitants. Women with children in arms and persons under 16 will be excluded from the saloons, while bets under one shilling will be prohibited. Winnings will not be paid out until the day following the race, as overcrowding bookmakers' officers has acted as an inducement to place further bets.

These are some of the main provisions of the new bill for combating the gambling craze, but many observers are of the opinion that they only touch the fringe of the problem, and that the only cure lies in the repeal of the ill-starred betting act of 1926. This course would be too sweeping, as well as difficult to achieve, as abolition of the traffic would represent a loss of State revenue amounting to $1,100,000 annually. The logical development of the present tendencies for regulation of the bookmakers' business lies in the direction of making betting, whether on or off the race course, a State monopoly run on totalizator or pari-mutuel principle. Many take the view that this is the only effective method to prevent the worst abuses of the traffic.

Railway Troubles.

It is feared that the strike troubles of the Great Southern Railways of Ireland will have a serious effect on the great horse show, which opens as usual during the first week in August. Even if an eleventh-hour settlement is reached, it will tend to scare away intending visitors. Two thousand tourists arrived on the morning the strike started, and many hurried back to England the same evening. This was a sad setback for Free State trade, and particularly disappointing in view of the fact that the last trade statistics published showed that the adverse trade balance had been reduced by some $22,000,000 within the past twelve months.

If the threatened general stoppage on all Southern Railway lines cannot be averted it will come as a staggering blow to the country's prosperity, as there was every indication that the present year would be one of the best in a decade. Every effort is being made to avert such a calamity.

POLES INVITE FARM NATIONS TO UNITE

Divide Export Markets and Stop Disastrous Competition, Is Warsaw's Plea.

By JERZY SZAPIRO.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

WARSAW, July 23.—Ministers of Agriculture from eight Central and Eastern European countries will meet in Warsaw in the middle of August at the invitation of the Polish Government to consider farm relief on an international scale. Finland, Estonia, Latvia, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Hungary, Yugoslavia and Bulgaria will send representatives to discuss the feasibility of an agrarian entente for the purpose of fostering the interests of agricultural States for the markets of industrial countries.

The idea of international agrarian understandings is not new to postwar Europe. Poland and Germany, despite a not too happy mutual relationship in some other respects, have already a so-called "rye convention" that has proved profitable for the rye exporters of both countries in the Scandinavian market. Moreover, delegates from Yugoslavia and Hungary went last week to Bucharest at Rumania's invitation to negotiate a Danubian "wheat convention." The conference to be held here is intended to enlarge the scope of such understandings, both as to territory and as to the range of products involved. The entire farming industry will be taken into account—grain, cattle, poultry and by-products.

The same conditions behind all attempts at international agrarian alliances—overproduction, falling prices, keen competition in foreign markets and dumping—have brought about this new move. The rationalization and cartelization of Europe's industry have made great progress in the last few years, but the organization of agriculture lags far behind, although successful efforts to raise production have been made everywhere, even in typical industrial countries.

Exports Held Vital.

The trade in farm produce is in a deplorable state. Agrarian countries suffer acutely from unfavorable prices and large stocks. Most of them import industrial goods and in borrowing money are often the prey of reckless foreign investors. The export of farm products is held to be their only salvation. Their purchasing power and financial strength stand or fall with the volume of exports and with prices. They are vitally interested in free markets in the industrial countries; the removal of restrictions and embargoes; stable and good prices, and elimination of underselling and dumping. The main business of the conference here will be the division of foreign markets so as to eliminate unsound competition. Transit problems and veterinary supervision will come next on the agenda. The latter question holds considerable interest, because the raising of standards of the veterinary service in East and Central Europe would certainly check attempts to depreciate, through veterinary restrictions, the value of farm goods imported from the East.

Poland knows, perhaps best of all, the difficulties attending exports of agricultural products. One of her chief consumers is Germany, but agrarian interests of the Reich have brought such strong pressure to bear on the Berlin Government that at present prohibitive customs duties have practically closed the German market. Recent German tariff increases have served to nullify the effects of the Polish-German trade agreement which was signed in March this year, after a full five years of tariff war. Moreover, Germany, the most industrialized country on Europe's mainland, now competes in the Austrian market with purely agrarian States. Chaotic competition all over Europe brings prices down to an uneconomic level, rye selling in Poland now being at half the price received in 1929.

Poland Takes the Lead.

Poland has tried to remove her own difficulties by concentrating her exports in the hands of a few responsible national companies acting as guiding and controlling offices for individual exporters. The quality of exported goods has thus achieved a higher grade of standardization, and better prices have been obtained than might otherwise have been the case.

What Poland has endeavored to do nationally she now proposes to do internationally. Hence the idea of the agrarian conference next month. The initiators of both the Bucharest and the Warsaw conferences have promised to cooperate with Geneva and register with the League of Nations economic committee any agreement reached.

A famous French economist once divided the European Continent into two Europes—progressive industrial and backward agricultural. Now his "backward" Europe is organizing to meet the other Europe on an equal footing and demand her share of Europe's prosperity.

Paris Plans to Add Two New Wings to Bourse, Anticipating Renewal of Heavy Trading Days

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 24.—One of the indications of French confidence that the present financial and trade depression will not long endure is the decision to proceed with plans for rebuilding and greatly enlarging the Bourse.

At the present moment the building where stock transactions are carried on seems practically deserted and there is certainly no evidence of a crowded condition. Only a few years ago, however, when the stock boom was in progress it was found that the Bourse building had been far outgrown, and the congestion was so acute that the Stock Exchange was frequently obliged to close its market for a couple of days in order to permit brokers and agents to catch up with back business they had been unable to transact because of inadequate facilities.

Such days will return, the French Stock Exchange foresees, and plans for enlargement of the Bourse in cooperation with the municipal government and State have been approved. The Bourse, which is a fine building, with classic portico and columns, will be extended by two large wings in the same style architecture. The additions will make it assume the aspect of a sumptuous palace instead of a small Creek temple.

New Law Governing Checks To Be Proposed in France

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 23.—Although the use of checks has increased considerably in France since the war, the Frenchmen's suspicion of them has not wholly disappeared. He prefers bank-notes as a rule; and even important firms doing a large business continue to pay their bills and demand payment in bank-notes.

Another step forward in the use of checks has been proposed in a bill which will be presented in Parliament this Autumn, in making it legal for checks to be typewritten.

Another stipulation in the bill is that a fine to the amount of 6 per cent of the value of the check will be inflicted on the drawer or issuer who omits to date his check, thereby delaying payment. A similar fine will be imposed on all persons presenting post-dated checks for payment, while effacement of the line on a crossed check, so as to make it payable on sight, may be punished by imprisonment.

GENEVA IS WEIGHING REPLIES TO BRIAND

Adjustment of Present League to European Federation Is First Problem.

NATIONAL VIEWS REFLECTED

Objections Raised in Official Notes Have Not Disturbed Hopes of Those Who Support French Proposals.

By CLARENCE K. STREIT.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

GENEVA, July 23.—With almost all the replies to the Briand memorandum now known the conviction generally has crystallized here that the first problem facing the proposed European federation will be its relations with the existing League of Nations. It involves the basic problem of the rôles, respectively and jointly, of regional and universal cooperation—the question whether the development of either is liable to be incompatible with the other and, if so, which should be sacrificed.

The covenant itself provides for possibility of regional understandings and though, as Albert Thomas, director of the International Labor Office, remarked in his recent report, the tendency is running more and more in this direction, the basic problems involved hardly have been studied. That is evident both from the attitude of European statesmen and League circles toward the Briand plan, which is the hardiest regional project yet proposed.

The thing that has most impressed Geneva in the replies to M. Briand has been the practical unanimity with which European League members urged the necessity to take care that the proposed European League did not weaken in any degree the world League of Nations. Friends of the Geneva institution are grateful to M. Briand for having provided the means of showing what a strong hold it has taken in ten years on Europe—few dreamed how popular it had become. It is obvious that some of the anxiety expressed over the international organ is spurious and meant to cover anxieties of a purely nationalistic character, but Geneva is so used to hypocrisy of this sort that it hardly allows its pleasure to be spoiled by the numerous expressions of solicitude for it.

Among League Officials.

This is particularly true of many secretariat officials, since for very natural reasons they themselves tend not only to share this solicitude for the institution whose welfare they are pledged to promote, but push it to extremes that sometimes savor of a desire to protect a vested interest or put the interests of their nation higher than the interests of peace and cooperation. It is indeed a curious fact that the attitude of some European governments toward the League and the Briand plan has been foreshadowed by the attitude of some of their nationals in the secretariat. A notable example of this is furnished by Great Britain, which argues that the League already is capable of realizing M. Briand's aims without the machinery he proposes and bases this on the European Health Conference the League held in Warsaw in 1922—the existence of which Secretary General Drummond looked up in the dusty archives a month ago—and other arguments formulated by Sir Arthur Salter, Director of the League's financial section in a recent confidential memorandum.

The general attitude toward the Briand project here, as in the European replies, is characterized not only by the conservative caution which any new idea must expect but by a striking lack of the active creative thinking which gave birth to the project. The same lip service is paid to the ideal and the same attention is then centred on the easy task of stressing the difficulties involved, whether they are obvious or whether M. Briand already has shown he was aware of them, instead of being centred on how to solve them. The tendency, in other words, is "Let Aristide do it"—with all of the crowd anxious to be back-seat drivers, each with a hand on the emergency brake.

M. Briand encounters this the more since the method he proposed for the European union is to start with a European league, which in some yet unexplained way would dovetail smoothly with the world league. The major tendency here is to jump to the conclusion that this method of promoting the desired European cooperation is bound to result in conflict and confusion with the existing League to its detriment. The premise is that the flesh and bones of the universal league are composed of European members, and the conclusion is that if a European league is formed then the universal organization will become a hollow skin.

Europe in the Present League.

On the other hand, some supporters of M. Briand agree with many Americans that what has kept the League from being really universal is the disproportionate influence the European members now have in it, which encourages Americans to consider this potential universal League really a European League and to keep out of it. They argue that the Briand plan, by removing purely European problems from the present institution, would help it to become the universal organization it aims to be and therefore make it more attractive to the United States. They point out, moreover, that members of Briand's European League would continue to be members of the existing League and continue linked with the world for cooperation in settling world problems. The latter is held to be facilitated by a European League's settling European problems or European angles of world problems, just as it is facilitated by the fact that there is only one German member of the existing League now instead of a multitude of German members, as there would have been if it had been established before the Reich federated.

There is undoubtedly real danger of confusion and friction between the jurisdiction of a European and a world league, for often it is hard to draw a line between European and world questions. The trouble is not that this problem is unrecognized but that there is little evidence here of constructive thinking on how to solve it, the tendency being to await the suggestions M. Briand will make when he reports to the European conference here in September.

Machinery at Hand.

Secretariat officials are particularly receptive to the British view of the existing League organization, bolstered, perhaps, with a European committee of the Council and Assembly which London proposes as sufficient to accomplish M. Briand's ideal. The machinery, they say, awaits and all that is lacking is the will to use it. The minority doubts this, pointing to the fact that the availability of machinery for universal cooperation has not so far proved much of a stimulus to European unity and arguing that the dust which has accumulated since 1922 on the Warsaw health precedent, toward which the British point, proves not how much but how little can be expected of it in this respect. M. Briand's supporters hold the establishment of a distinct European rallying point is absolutely necessary if Europeans are ever to begin thinking as Europeans and that confining them to a universal rallying point tends more to keep them divided as a Continental group than united.

The opponents seem to admit that this reasoning is sound sense, although they maintain that a great danger exists which might engender inter-Continental conflict. The British, with a world-wide empire, are naturally in a difficult position in this regard, but those stressing the above danger usually have in mind the possible opposition of the United States.

The proneness of Europeans here to assume without investigation that Americans are bound to oppose a European federation—despite the recent digests of the American press received here showing it to be overwhelmingly sympathetic toward, instead of suspicious of, the Briand plan—makes neutral observers here suspect the American bugaboo is conjured up chiefly as a blind to cover the unwillingness of various governments to make sacrifices to achieve European union.

Root of Objections.

This unwillingness to sacrifice national for common European good, indeed, seems to be the real hidden root of all objections flourishing on the surface. The idea of a European federation, of course, interferes with the old conceptions such as the traditional British policy of keeping the Continent divided, while on the other hand it arouses suspicion that M. Briand is aiming purely to maintain a status quo favorable to France, or that Germany and Italy are regarding it simply as a means to bargaining to strengthen their own positions.

All this being quite normal, the outlook seems to be no worse than might be expected—if as bad. What friends of the project consider the most disappointing development is the dissolution of the Reichstag, for they believe a European federation really depends on the French and Germans agreeing on it. With the German elections coming on Sept. 14, Germany will not be able to talk so authoritatively when the project comes up here during the Assembly as M. Briand hoped. If the Left wins at the polls and a Ministry is formed quickly enough for German action here in September, then the election, instead of delaying the development of the federation, may, of course, speed it.

Physicians Defend Plump Turkish Lines As 'Miss Turkey' Starts Fad of Reducing

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ISTAMBUL, July 23.—Certain Constantinople matrons, following the example of the current "Miss Turkey," who competed in the international beauty contest in Paris last Spring, have gone in for reducing along Western lines.

This movement dates from mid-Winter, when a score of judges chose plump Mubedjel Namik Hanoum to represent her country's conception of feminine charm. Mubedjel, timid, well chaperoned and a trifle gauche received not even honorable mention at Paris, whereas stately, graceful Miss Diplardokou of Greece carried off the crown.

"Put yourself under my physical culture régime and we'll have you looking fit for the international contest in Rio de Janeiro," offered Selim Sirri Bey, director of physical education in the Istanbul schools.

Mubedjel faithfully followed instructions. Thirty-three pounds melted away. Suddenly the medical association took notice and at its last session demanded to know of the Minister of Hygiene what right Selim Sirri Bey had to tread on its toes. Reducing courses, members claimed, were the special territory of physicians. They viewed with alarm a tendency on the part of the stout feminists of Istanbul to patronize institutes of beauty.

The president of the medical association caustically said: "I think that the principal object of a woman should be to acquire maximum strength and not necessarily beauty, which more or less depends upon fashion."

Considering the heavy consumption of sugars, fats and starches in this country, it will be a long time before Turkey changes its preconceived opinions regarding the feminine form.

ROME VIEWS PLANS FOR OCEAN FLIGHT

Big Seaplane Being Fitted Out to Soar at Great Heights on Newfoundland Hop.

HOPES TO FIND EAST WIND

Course Will Be Over the Azores and Plane May Land There to Refuel if Necessity Arises.

By ARNOLDO CORTESI.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, July 23.—On the shore of Lake Bracciano, some twenty miles northwest of Rome, mechanics are working feverishly night and day putting the last touches on the huge three-engine seaplane in which six bold adventurers propose, within the next three weeks, to attempt to span the Atlantic Ocean in a westerly direction from Rome to Newfoundland. It is to be piloted by its designer and constructor, Giuseppe Rossi, with a crew composed of two assistant pilots, one Italian-American girl, one navigation officer, one wireless operator and one mechanic.

The seaplane is a huge biplane with a large boatlike cabin underslung from the lower wing. It is engined with three Isotta Fraschini motors, each rated at 500 horsepower but actually developing nearly 600 at 2,000 revolutions per minute. It is extremely seaworthy, special care being taken in the construction of the cabin, which houses the entire crew as well as all fuel tanks. The designer believes the cabin sufficiently strong to float in any weather for many days if obliged to make a forced landing in the ocean.

Details of Seaplane.

The seaplane, empty, weighs 14,500 pounds, including all fittings, instruments, wireless apparatus, and so forth. It can take off with a load of 16,500 pounds. The load, therefore, is about 115 per cent of the weight of the machine empty, which is considered a record and a triumph in designing. Its load of 16,500 pounds is composed of 14,300 pounds of fuel, 1,100 pounds of oil, while the weight of the crew, their baggage, food and other impediments is 1,100 pounds. The machine is capable of flying under full load with only two engines, developing a speed of ninety miles an hour. When it has consumed 5,500 pounds of fuel it is capable of flying with only one engine, developing a speed of seventy miles an hour. Its maximum theoretical range is about 5,200 miles, as compared with the total distance of 4,000 miles separating Rome from Newfoundland.

The high maximum theoretical range is obtained by cutting out first one, then two of the three engines, as the total weight of the machine is reduced owing to the fact that the fuel is gradually consumed. Recent experiments show that the full force of the three engines is only required to lift the machine off the water under full load. As soon as the machine is in the air one engine can be cut out, then another when 5,500 pounds of fuel is consumed. The fuel consumption of the Isotta Fraschini 500 horsepower engines is 165 pounds an hour. With two engines going, 5,500 pounds of fuel are therefore consumed in seventeen hours. At a speed of ninety miles an hour this represents a distance of some 1,500 miles. With only one engine going the remaining 8,800 pounds of fuel would be consumed in fifty-three hours, which represent a distance of 3,700 miles. The total distance possible is 5,200 miles.

To Fly at Heights.

It has been calculated that the effect of the prevailing winds over the Atlantic Ocean is such that about 40 to 50 per cent more fuel is required to cross the ocean in a westerly than in an easterly direction. The margin of safety allowed by the pilot therefore is hardly sufficient to risk a non-stop flight from Rome to Newfoundland. They hope, however, to be able to exploit the excellent climbing powers of their machine in order to rise to a sufficient height above the ocean as soon as their total weight is somewhat reduced, to find favorable westerly winds. In any case they propose heading first toward the Azores and when they arrive there they may decide, on the basis of fuel consumption up to that point, whether it is possible to continue directly for Newfoundland or whether it is more prudent to refuel there.

The seaplane is to be flown within the next few days to Ostia at the mouth of the Tiber. The pilots consider it safer to start from sea level in order not to subject the machine and engines to an excessive initial strain.

PARIS HELD LESS AMUSING.

Columnist Says Americans Find True French Gayety in Berlin.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 23.—That Paris is no longer the most amusing city in the world has been admitted this week by at least one Frenchman, Georges de la Fouchardière, columnist of L'Oeuvre.

"The truth is," he wrote one day this week, "Paris is no longer amusing. I would n venture to say that we have grown serious but we have become a serious nuisance. The rich foreigner goes from Montmartre to Montparnasse—which is like going from Scylla to Charybdis. Disillusioned, he goes further on his way from resort to resort, and eventually returns home, completely plucked, to his own country to talk about us."

De la Fouchardière believes the root of the evil is in the tradition that has grown up concerning American tourists—this year less numerous than formerly. The French, he says, had come to regard them as succulent birds of passage; birds that migrate from their own country every year; birds that were intended by Providence to be shot down while passing over France. Thanks to their experience, these birds have learned to fly high and fast—and, what is even worse, they know now how to count their chance. They are passing over France so fast that the poor Frenchman is not getting a real chance at them, and he is complaining loudly that they are even going to Berlin.

De la Fouchardière is caustic, concluding that "perhaps the reason why they go to Berlin, is because it is only there that one can find good old French gayety."

WATCH TOWER OBSERVATIONS DESCRIBING THE SCENE IN AMERICA

POLITICAL ISSUES STIR ALL SECTIONS

Watchtower Observers Show an America Intent Upon Local Election Contests.

NATIONAL POLICY IGNORED

But in Maine as in California and Texas the Community Becomes Centre of Interest.

By ARTHUR KROCK.

Any one possessed of deductive reasoning powers as slight as those of Sherlock Holmes's Dr. Watson could very readily conclude after a glance at the Watchtower letters in this section of THE NEW YORK TIMES today that Americans hold their national elections in even-numbered years. Literally from Maine to California the correspondents are writing of political contests and decisions. Since their dispatches are largely spontaneous, being based on the correspondent's impression of the uppermost subject in his community, the fact that from all parts of the Union the theme and tenor of today's articles are political should frankly persuade students of our manners and customs that we are a politically minded people.

Yet all week there was little definite political action, while in other orbits of our national life the force that makes events was moving. Mr. Huston, the apparently ineradicable Chairman of the Republican National Committee, finally agreed to retire under White House pressure; and Detroit recalled its mayor, Charles Bowles. But probably many more people around the American dinner table were discussing the mix-up of the Chicago babies, the weather, the re-instatement of W. T. Tilden 2d and the wreck at Elizabeth, N. J., than either of these topics. That Glenn Curtiss and James Eads How had died; that no hoboes attended the funeral of the latter, who had devoted his curious life to their befriending; that Chairman Legge of the Farm Board was at least a conversational match for the agrarian leaders, undoubtedly interested millions of Americans. Business men and devotees to immigration exclusion perhaps found most absorbing the question of whether former Police Commissioner Whalen of New York City had been fooled by what he believed were Moscow's instructions to the Amtorg. And many, reading of the $12,000 salary and $1,000,000 bonus of President Grace of the Bethlehem Steel Company expressed a decided preference for being paid on that basis themselves.

But the correspondents wrote largely of politics in its local application because, in even-numbered years, it is our national sport. Next year in July the motif will be found lacking. The fact that Canada is about to hold a general election leaves only Mexico, on this continent, going about its business without interruption from office-seekers.

Naval Treaty Ignored.

They are being chosen by districts this year under our Congressional system. Probably that is why the great national fact of the passage of the naval arms limitations treaty is barely alluded to in any of the Watchtower articles. Senator Johnson of California led a brisk but hopeless fight against the treaty; apparently California paid very little attention to it. The subjoined dispatch from Los Angeles deals with a variety of subjects, but it contains not one word about the most conspicuous national political effort recently made by one of its citizens. Obviously the contemplation of our communities is inward at the moment.

Looking inward with them, the reader comes to his biennial inspection of the political trend of Maine, outlined in the dispatch from Boston. Maine holds its State election almost two months before the rest of the States, and political managers feverishly watch the size of the Republican vote to base estimates of the political complexion of the next Congress. Years ago some one with a gift for epigram remarked that "as Maine goes, so goes the nation." It isn't true save in the realm of percentages. Nevertheless, in odd-numbered years everybody in politics watches Maine. This year the voters are reported to be apathetic. The same was said in July, 1928, about the whole country. In November it cast a colossal vote. Our dispatch reveals one reason why Maine voters should not remain apathetic in the astonishing statement that it is the sixth most expensively governed State in the Union.

Pennsylvania Divided.

Apathy is distinctly not the case in Pennsylvania. Our Pittsburgh correspondent tells of the continuation of the struggle between the Republican party wings led by Gifford Pinchot and William S. Vare of Philadelphia. It is surprising to read that some of the Pinchot counselors hope that the vote of Luzerne County, which Pinchot carried on the face of the returns, will be thrown out, thus giving the nomination for Governor to Vare's man, Francis Shunk Brown, and enabling Pinchot to cut all connections with the Republican organization. But, whatever the wish and whatever the outcome, it really looks as if another Democratic Governor might be seen in Pennsylvania. That party is out for repeal of the prohibition laws; Pinchot's dry adherence has cost him much and gained him little.

Chicagoans are struggling again to obtain honest elections. Despite the proportion and character of the crime news which that city furnishes, no one can doubt that its percentage of upright citizens is overwhelming. But if their votes can be split by cunning partisan appeals, and then not counted as a result of election thuggery, they have little opportunity to express themselves by electing men who will divorce government from alliance with crime. It is a curious commentary on the endless battle for purity in public affairs that a woman lieutenant of Mrs. Ruth Hanna McCormick, Republican Senatorial nominee, is now a storm centre growing out of misreported campaign contributions.

Texas, according to the Watchtower telegram from Dallas, is grasping another horn of the dilemma of self-government. In that State the direct primary has proved costly and set up a tortuous process of selection. Invariably two primaries have to be held. So some leaders are thinking longingly of a partial return to the convention system in order to have but one primary and fewer candidates. Our correspondent reports that there are even audible sighs for "an honest political machine" to be erected. It is the backswing of the reform pendulum which the elder La Follette started going.

A shot in a Los Angeles court room, fired by a defrauded small investor at a financier charged with responsibility for his loss, may seem a topic removed from politics. But our Watchtower dispatch today quickly leaps the chasm. In the assassin's pocket was found an inflammatory pamphlet penned by "Radio Bob" Shuler, spectacular Coast parson. Mr. Shuler being politically powerful because of the size of his following, the murder instantly got into politics. Now rival mass-meetings, pro and anti- Shuler, are to be held. The Gubernatorial campaign is affected. But the correspondent's survey includes an industrial subject, the strained relations over Boulder Dam which exist between Arizona, the producer, and California, the consumer. He sees peace ahead, based on mutuality of interest. That usually occurs. And the politics of industry comes in for attention because the gasoline rate war, declared to punish the independent oil producers, is about over—mournful news for the joy-riders of the Coast.

Republican Virginia.

From Virginia comes a reminder of the campaign of 1928. When the State voted for Hoover three Congressional districts went Republican. Two of them, thinks our correspondent, will be reclaimed, and one of these, oddly enough, is the Republican mountain stronghold of the Slemp family. The fact that Mr. Slemp declined to make the race implies the existence of conditions ominous for the Republicans there. But at the other end of the State, around Norfolk, business considerations foreshadow the continued possession of this ancient Democratic district by the Republicans. Only the analysts of politics will care very much about any of this.

It is surprising to read in the telegram from Omaha that the grocer of Broken Bow, the other George W. Norris, wrote out his withdrawal from the contest against the famous Senator of the same name some time before his papers were rejected by the courts. It is more surprising to read that Senator Norris's son-in-law possessed this paper even while the news was full of prophecies that the Senator, if made the victim of the name trick, would run independently. But this has been a situation full of guile and mystery from the beginning. The suggestion that there has been some on both sides confirms the lay view of politics. There is, of course, no intimation that the Senator himself knew anything about the conditional withdrawal of the grocer of Broken Bow.

A Human Problem.

New Orleans alone furnishes a different brand of correspondence. It is the story of the human versus the engineering viewpoint in connection with the lands condemned for the purposes of Mississippi River flood control. The visiting Congressmen were impressed with the plight of landowners between the new levee walls. The engineers were looking solely to their flood control problem. More humanity is promised when Congress meets, but not at the expense of efficiency. That would be a rare and admirable solution.

Canada supplies a new demonstration of an old political truth as its campaign closes. The truth is that issues are born, not made. Premier King sought to stress the tariff, the countervailing duties which Canada is to make against the Hawley-Smoot bill, the closer trade alliance between the Dominion and the empire. But his Conservative opponent has forced a discussion of unemployment and slack business conditions instead. Since that was uppermost in the public mind, it had but to be mentioned to become the burning topic.

It is so with politics everywhere. The Liberals' offer of a Hooverian "experts' commision" to deal with unemployment has been less appealing to the man out of work than the Conservative pledge to convoke Parliament in extra session. But, though the provincial governments are largely Conservative, a Liberal general victory is said to be indicated. That no Communist (there are nine running) has ever sat in Parliament, and that nine women are candidates this year, show other resemblances between our northern neighbor and ourselves.

Shifflett Family Is First In Jefferson's Old County

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

RICHMOND, Va., July 24.—Albemarle County in days of yore produced Thomas Jefferson and George Rogers Clark, but its principal product today seems to be Shifletts. The recent school census of the county revealed that there are no less than 270 Shiflett children attending the county schools. Multiplying this number by three, which is about the ratio of children to the population of the State, we have 810 as the approximate number of members of the Shiflett family in Albemarle, exclusive of the town of Charlottesville.

The Smiths, Joneses and Browns are not in it with the Shifletts in the county. This prolific family was originally concentrated chiefly in the vicinity of White Hall, but it has branched out considerably of late, and its scions may be found in almost any part of old Albemarle.

SHIPBUILDING ON DELAWARE

Famous River Expected to Make Good Title of 'the Clyde of America.'

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

PHILADELPHIA, July 24.—The shipbuilding industry on the Delaware River, which has been hard hit in recent years, is due for a revival that will be felt more keenly by Fall, in the opinion of local men. They expect the river to make good its title of "the Clyde of America," conferred on it because some of the navy's proudest fighting ships, as well as many merchantmen, were built along its banks.

A survey just completed by the Philadelphia Business Progress Association shows that about 42 per cent of the merchant shipping under construction or contracted for in this country's yards on July 1 was being built or will be built on the Delaware River.

DETROIT IS RUSHED INTO CITY ELECTION

Recalled Mayor Enters the Field Against Divided Forces of the Opposition.

STRENGTH OF GROESBECK

Popular Ex-Governor Is Urged to Enter the Race — Gangster Crimes in a Political Crisis.

By G. H. KELSEY.

DETROIT, Mich., July 24.—Although recalled by a majority exceeding 30,000 in last Tuesday's special election, Charles Bowles remains Mayor of Detroit until another election is held on Sept. 9, at which time he will run against one or more candidates still to be nominated as his possible successor.

Unless Mayor Bowles withdraws from the second election, his name under the charter goes automatically upon the ballot. Bowles has refused to withdraw and his chief aid, John Gillespie, Commissioner of Public Works, has announced "we have just begun to fight." Nevertheless the unexpected size of the adverse majority leads acute political observers to believe Bowles will be defeated unless his opposition is divided.

The hastily formed committee which circulated the recall petitions was bent merely upon removing Bowles from office and had nobody in mind to succeed him. Immediately after the election it disbanded. Candidates for Mayor must be nominated by petition of some fourteen thousand voters fifteen days before the election. No petitions have yet appeared.

Several prominent politicians are in a receptive mood but public opinion still waits on events.

Groesbeck's Chances.

There is one man who it is generally believed could rally the Mayor's opponents to his standard. He is Alexander Groesbeck, three times Governor of Michigan, defeated for a fourth term four years ago by the present Governor, Fred W. Green. Groesbeck is regarded even by his enemies as a great administrator. His faults are on the political side. He is not a handshaker, he cares not whom he offends, he plays a lone hand and takes no one into his full confidence. These habits of mind created many enemies during his Governorship, and the prejudice against a fourth term aided in encompassing his defeat.

In two terms Governor Green has also made enemies, and when he announced that he would not run again a vigorous demand poured in on Groesbeck that he be once more a candidate. After great importuning Groesbeck unwillingly consented and nominating petitions were filed.

But petitions were also filed for Green and for George Welsh, City Manager of Grand Rapids, a close friend of Groesbeck.

During the recall campaign Groesbeck was repeatedly mentioned as an ideal possibility for Mayor. Now that the recall has succeeded Groesbeck is being asked to withdraw from the Governorship race to run against Bowles. He has conferred with Welsh and others, and it is believed that if his supporters will agree to back Welsh for Governor Groesbeck may yield and run for Mayor. Such action would probably satisfy a large body of substantial citizens, who are planning a charter amendment to give Detroit a city manager. Groesbeck has repeatedly declared himself favorable to the city manager scheme, and if he were Mayor and the charter were amended he would almost certainly be appointed manager.

Possible Supporters.

Should Groesbeck announce his willingness to run for Mayor it is almost certain that John C. Nagel, President of the Common Council; George Engel, former City Controller, and several others who are in a receptive mood would endorse his candidacy.

There remains former Mayor John W. Smith, twice defeated for re-election. Smith is keeping his own counsel. His hatred for Bowles might prove a determining factor in keeping him from running if a candidate appears who seems sure of defeating the Mayor.

No single cause can be assigned for Mayor Bowles's defeat but a succession of political and administrative mistakes which undermined confidence in his ability. His most serious campaign blunder was his announcement, after ten gangster killings, that perhaps the best way of dealing with the criminal element was to allow the gangsters to kill one another off. His opponents immediately charged that gang warfare, coupled with gambling and vice, was due largely to the Mayor's own reorganization of the Police Department whereby handling of this problem was taken from the precinct captains and given to the Central Bureau.

The Gangster War.

A few hours after the recall vote had been announced came the assassination of Gerald Buckley, a bitter opponent of the Mayor, presumably by gangsters. Next day the Central Vice Squad was abolished and power restored to the precinct captains. Raids on blind pigs and gambling establishments followed immediately. Evidently Bowles realizes he is ruined unless crime is checked.

Last November, Bowles received a heavy women's vote. Election officials say the women's vote in the recall election was very light. They believe that, rather than admit themselves mistaken, many women who aided Bowles's election would not vote in the recall.

"RADIO FISHING" IN KANSAS.

Bass Especially Are Believed to Be Partial to the Canned Music.

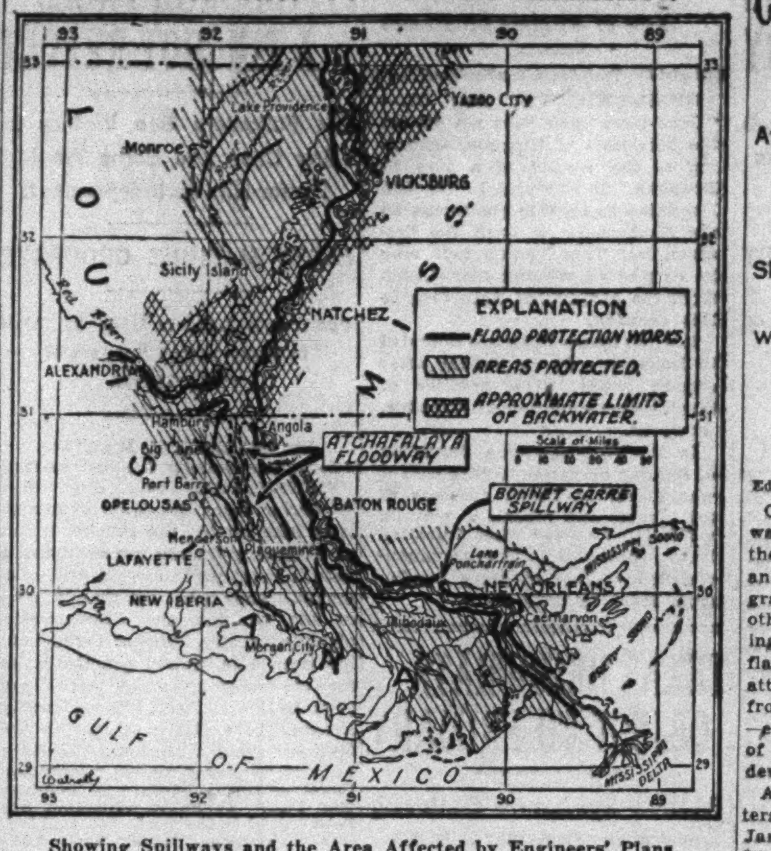
Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

PRATT, Kan., July 23.—The attention of Alva Clapp, State Game and Fish Warden, has been called to "radio" fishing.

It is said the anglers have radio-equipped cars or portable sets which are set going when the fishing starts. Bass especially are said to be attracted by the music.

Clapp does not put much faith in the story. Bass experts say it takes more than a strain of "Happy Days" or "Carolina Moon" to land one.

FLOOD CONTROL FOR LOWER MISSISSIPPI.



Showing Spillways and the Area Affected by Engineers' Plans.

Mississippi Valley Gets a Hearing On the Policies of Flood Control

The Recent Tour by House Committeemen Is Believed to Have Paved the Way for the "Humanizing" of Engineers' Plans.

By GEORGE N. COAD.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

NEW ORLEANS, July 23.—The lower Mississippi Valley regards the past ten days as likely to mark a turn in its struggle with army engineers over the policies to be pursued in flood control work. Well the valley may, for it seems that in this period a majority of the Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives has decided that the engineers' policies must be humanized.

Next December the committeemen who have been making an inspection of the valley from New Orleans northward, and incidentally exchanging caustic statements with United States Attorney Talbot of the Eastern District of Louisiana, will be asked to amend the Flood Control act so that the engineers cannot proceed, as the valley thinks, to make the cure worse than the disease. After the formal and informal utterances of the committeemen during the trip, there can be no doubt that the policy will be radically changed.

Basic Principle Involved.

The valley and the engineers have been far apart, not only on certain technical features of the plan to control the Mississippi, but also on the more important basic principle underlying all the operations. The intention of Congress, it has been held here, was to relieve the people of the valley of the undue burden they had so long borne in order that the waters of a large part of the nation might drain past their homes to the Gulf. But the engineers have acted in such a way as to convince the valley that they thought Congress meant the waters should be sent to the Gulf through channels to be prescribed without regard to what hardships the prescription might work on the people.

They proposed, for instance, to buy the land on which the guide levees would be erected on the floodways, but to pay not a penny now for the damage bound to result to the lands confined between the levees. This land would be flooded on an average of once in thirteen years, according to the engineers, so that the waters might not break the levees of the main channel at their weakest spot.

But, if there were no floodways and the waters were left to break out where they could and get down as fast as they could, this land would be flooded, on an average, only once in twenty-five years. It was a gamble, whether one's plantation would be flooded this year or twenty-four years hence. And so one could sell it, or borrow on it with a reasonable chance of avoiding inundation until the loan had been repaid.

The Land Owner's Plight.

But consider the predicament of a land owner in a floodway now. Every one knows his land will soon be inundated, his crops ruined, his buildings damaged. After the water has come and he has rowed or waded out, hired a lawyer, sued the Government of the United States, carried the suit through the courts of appeal, he may get a few hundred dollars or he may not. But who is going to buy his land at anything like its former value or lend him money on his crops? Who is going to convince these people that flood relief is a boon?

The engineers submerged this human equation in a mass of figures as to the proportion of swamp to arable land. Their calculations, looked at from a levee on the Mississippi, seemed the most fantastically cruel plans ever seriously advanced by a modern government.

They run, in effect, like this: Since such and such a percentage of the land is swamp or forest-bearing land, and therefore not subject to damage by overflow, we will not pay for flowage rights until after the damage is done and appraised. True, there is some arable land, on which some thousands of people make a living, but this portion is not large enough to count.

Fortunately for the valley, the committee considered that the human factors outweighed the others. They agreed with the valley that the flood control act was passed for the relief of the people, not for the demonstration of the nation's ability to prescribe the course of floods.

A Question of Relief.

Traveling through the Teche Country, standing under the ancient live oaks where the Acadians landed, the Congressmen realized the absurdity of relieving a people by imposing new burdens upon them. They realized that the ratio of arable land to swamp did not tell the story. Facing the people who would be sacrificed by the engineers for the sake of some abstract principle or other, the committee declared the sacrifice must not be.

It was not only the Atchafalayans who were marked for the sacrifice. The people of the Tensas, the people of the New Madrid floodways were similarly designated in the engineers' plans. Since the committee has conceded the injustice in the one case, it cannot do less in the others.

The whole valley has gained tremendously by the inspection. In the special case of the Bonnet Carré spillway, the committee came into conflict with the United States Attorney here, E. E. Talbot. Mr. Talbot is a young man with a gift for sarcasm. After a subcommittee had looked over the situation and agreed that there was evidence of coercion of landowners by the government and declared that any one contributing to the delay of settling the claims should be dismissed from the Federal service, Mr. Talbot issued a statement far from reverent in tone. The subcommittee replied and the dispute goes on.

Condemnation Proceedings.

True enough, the engineers are now, after urging by the Attorney General, condemning land within the levees, but they have not convinced the owners that they intend justice to them. Instead, the owners complain that, having rendered their land useless by cutting it off, the engineers are now coercing them by delaying settlement. Whether this be true as a whole or not, or whether the owners are asking overmuch for the property, this writer does not presume to state. But it is certain that the owners made such a case before the committee as to bring it to condemn strongly the methods being pursued and to undertake to remove from the Federal service any one contributing willfully to this delay.

The conflict in the valley is a matter of concern to the whole nation. Undoubtedly some of the opposition to the engineers is inspired by very selfish motives, but just as certainly their broad policy commits the nation to a merciless course of oppression toward those it is supposed to be assisting.

This is so plain here that after one looks at the men who proposed and are trying to execute the policy, it seems it must be some fantastic joke, for they do not look—or act, in other matters — different from ordinary men. Quite probably the dispute with United States Attorney Talbot will bring the matter to the attention of President Hoover, for a demand upon the Attorney General to remove him may be made.

That occasion ought to provide an opportunity for changing the policy without awaiting amendments to the law, certain to be made, next Winter. The President could scarcely do more to convince the valley of the just intentions of the administration than to put an end at once to the business of making the cure worse than the disease.

Politics Invades Northwest Picnics As Candidates Seek to Address Farmers

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

ST. PAUL, July 23.—The old American institution of the picnic has had a renaissance in the Northwest. In its new form, as developed in the rural Northwest, the picnic is a combination of the family outing, a Fourth of July celebration, a political rally and a revival meeting, with a touch of university extension thrown in.

Every Summer sees hundreds of these gatherings. They are usually organized by the local farm bureau. The farmers come by the hundreds from all over the county. The place is usually some favored grove or lakeside, with convenient space for the parking of the huge fleet of cars in which the picnickers arrive. Miles of wieners and small oceans of coffee and lemonade are consumed. Games are played, and music.

But especially there are speeches. Speeches about better farming, speeches about home economics, speeches about the tariff and about cooperation. Politicians have a literal picnic at such meetings. They meet their constituents, learn what they are thinking about, send up trial balloons and, of course, make a few well-chosen remarks. "Making the farm bureau picnics" is a well-tried and accepted part of the political ritual.

CHICAGO ELECTION HAS BITTER SEQUEL

Attorney Charges That Clerks and Judges Were Hired Contrary to Law.

SENATORIAL RACE INVOLVED

Woman on County Voting Board Held Key to Inquiry Concerning Ruth McCormick's Fund.

By S. J. DUNCAN-CLARK.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

CHICAGO, July 24.—The newspaper war now in progress in Chicago fills the air with the clamor of charges and counter-charges, demands for grand jury action, libel suits and other evidences that long-smouldering animosities have broken into flame. The public is entertained and attention is, unfortunately, diverted from matters of greater importance—even from the Lingle inquiry out of which this unseemly quarrel has developed.

Among such more important matters is a hearing before County Judge Jarecki. It is based upon petitions filed by Charles Center Case, former attorney for the Board of Election Commissioners, now an Assistant State's Attorney and a lawyer of excellent reputation, who seeks the dismissal of Fred V. Maguire, chairman of the board, on charges that he countenanced the appointment of unfit persons as judges and clerks of election at the primary in which Mrs. Ruth Hanna McCormick was nominated for the United States Senate. County officials were named at the same primary, together with candidates for the General Assembly and Congress.

Judge Regarded Fearless.

Mr. Maguire is the appointee of Judge Jarecki, who is final authority in all matters pertaining to the work of the Board of Election Commissioners. The judge has been a vigorous and effective agent in advocating and promoting safeguards for the franchise.

He is a Democrat, and it is understood that he has been frequently in conflict with party leaders because of his zeal in the cause of honest elections. The practical politicians of whatever party are not fond of him, but he has enjoyed the respect and support of voters in both parties because of his record of fair-minded and fearless action. He has penalized more corrupt and delinquent election officials than any other judge who ever sat on the Cook County bench. In many instances the prosecutions were conducted by Mr. Case, prior to his resignation as attorney for the board.

Mr. Case resigned immediately before the April primary after a heated argument with Chairman Maguire over a question of procedure. He later quoted Mr. Maguire as expressing emphatic contempt for certain requirements of the law. The chairman denied he had so expressed himself.

Outline of Charges.

The board consists of three members—Maguire and Harry A. Lipsky, Democrats, and Mabel Reinecke, Republican—but the ouster petition is directed only against Mr. Maguire.

In his petition Mr. Case lists more than 400 persons who he charges were appointed as election officials contrary to qualifications required by law. Many of these persons, he alleges, have police records, some for grave offenses. He further charges that in many instances they were appointed over protests made by responsible persons or agencies.

When Senator Nye recessed the Senate Committee's inquiry into the campaign expenditures of Mrs. McCormick he declared proceedings would be suspended until service could be had on Mrs. Mabel Reinecke. Mrs. Reinecke's name has bobbed up frequently in the testimony of witnesses. Senator Nye was led to refer to her as the "key woman" in the inquiry. It was shown that a check for $2,500, contributed by Colonel R. B. McCormick to the campaign fund, had been turned over to Mrs. Reinecke, and that her husband, George W. Reinecke, had given his check for the same amount to the Young People's Republican League, an organization supporting Mrs. McCormick. Reinecke's check was listed in the candidate's tabulation of contributors, but no mention had been made of Colonel McCormick's check until he himself disclosed it on the stand.

Women Long Acquainted.

The acquaintance of Mrs. Reinecke and Mrs. McCormick dates back to the days when both were Bull Moosers. The former was then secretary for a Chicago attorney who was active in the Progressive party. When Medill McCormick was elected Senator Mrs. Reinecke was made Collector of Internal Revenue at Chicago. She served in that office with marked ability. Charles S. Deneen succeeded the late Senator McCormick at Washington and Mrs. Reinecke lost her job.

Early this year, and prior to the primary, Judge Jarecki appointed Mrs. Reinecke to fill a vacancy caused by his dismissal of a member of the Board of Election Commissioners. It was recognized as a good appointment based on Mrs. Reinecke's record as a woman of unusual intelligence and capacity, but it was also recognized as having a distinctly political aspect, because of her known close association with Mrs. McCormick, candidate for the Republican Senatorial nomination.

Political Pact Rumored.

Rumors were afloat before the primary that an understanding had been reached between the Democrats and anti-Deneen Republicans involving mutual aid in the defeat of Senator Deneen for renomination, and in the defeat of Deneen candidates for county office, either at the primary or by Democrats at the November election.

Meantime the hearing continues before Judge Jarecki. Attorney Case is still presenting his evidence. Lawyers representing both the Republican and Democratic organizations have entered appearances and are defending accused officials of their own political faiths. Chairman Maguire is, of course, represented by counsel. The citizen watching the three inquiries — Senatorial, grand jury and County Court—is impressed by the tangled web which politics and its less creditable allies weave in the affairs of this big city.

A SENATOR'S "DOUBLE."

George W. Norris, Grocer of Broken Bow, Neb.

OMAHA HAZY OVER ITS TWO NORRISES

Candidacy of Norris the Grocer and His Withdrawal Leave Questions Unanswered.

NYE IS UNDER CRITICISM

After Charging Irregularities, He Draws Much Fire by Suddenly Dropping Investigation.

By ROLAND M. JONES.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

OMAHA, Neb., July 23.—The heavy excitement is over. Senator George W. Norris of McCook, Neb., and Washington, D. C., remains in sole and undisputed possession of the Norris name on the Republican primary ballot. Grocer George W. Norris has returned, smiling, debonair and guileless, to his groceries at Broken Bow and Senator Nye has given up, temporarily at least, the effort to get at the bottom of the "dirty work."

Now that the primary is not to be mocked and the voters befuddled by having two Norrises on the ballot like the two Dromio boys on the stage, a temporary calm prevails. But it is a smouldering calm, a calm by contrast with the fury of the storm at its height rather than a real one. The affair provoked too much display of bitterness and resentment and there are too many questions which have not yet been satisfactorily answered to permit it to be now regarded as a closed incident.

There cannot be any calm where Senator Norris is concerned until he severs all connection with the Republican party in Nebraska or it is severed for him by such means as politicians can find to compass that end.

Hostility to Senator.

Back of the implacable hostility to the Senator is the feeling that it is politically just as reprehensible to elope with one of the party's nominations to an important office and then to use it against the party's interest as it is morally reprehensible to run away with another man's wife. And those who hold that view are quite as thoroughly convinced of its rightness as Senator Norris is of the rightness of the course he has pursued in public life.

The belated filing of the candidacy of the second Norris, which caused all the tumult and the shouting, was universally accepted as a "put-up job," not only by the friends of the Senator but by his foes and neutrals as well. Such things, it was assumed, do not just happen. But they were all wrong. It was just a remarkable coincidence. At least that is Grocer Norris's explanation, made with engaging frankness, and so far uncontroverted by any direct evidence to the contrary.

Nobody, it seems, put the grocer up to it. He thought it up all by himself and meant it as a bona fide effort to be nominated and elected to the United States Senate, where he believed he could represent Nebraska much better than his celebrated namesake.

Questions Remaining.

With this question thus cleared up there are others clamoring for an answer. Why did Senator Nye, after it was announced that Grocer Norris was plowing through the mud to get back from Missouri, adjourn his hearing at the very hour of Norris's arrival? The grocer seemed as curious as any one to know the answer. He particularly wanted to explain that the reason there was only 41 cents in his bank balance was because he kept his money in stocks and bonds. As he views it, it is rather "unclubby" to show up a man's bank balance that way.

And how does it come, the curious are asking, that John P. Robertson, Senator Norris's secretary and son-in-law, was carrying the signed withdrawal of Grocer Norris around in his pocket on Friday while the legal battle was still unsettled and the probable withdrawal of the Senator to run as an independent was being discussed? The grocer says he signed it and turned it over to his attorney to be used in the event that former Governor McKelvie could be agreed upon as an opposition candidate. But why Mr. Robertson did not file it immediately it came into his possession has not been explained.

Straight Fight Now.

While the more virulent of the anti-Norrisites were saying that the duplicate filing served him right and that it was no worse a trick than he had played on the Republican party for years, the moderates frankly preferred a straight out, above board Norris-anti-Norris fight at the polls. They virtually get their wish. The contest has been narrowed down to Norris and State Treasurer Stebbins.

There has been a good deal of criticism of Senator Nye, both for coming here to start an inquiry into the Norris-Norris affair and then for dropping it so suddenly. Outside of the possible use of money in the campaign, it was complained that it was none of his business who filed or why, and that he ought not to use his office in the interest of one candidate while a campaign is on. But having started it and having publicly stated that he believes the second Norris filing was not made in good faith, they want to know why he does not go ahead and prove it or exonerate everybody concerned.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., July 23.—When Frank Keaton shot Motley Flint, millionaire banker, in a Los Angeles court room the other day, he started a chain of circumstances which have set all Southern California on edge, and which may have far-reaching political results. It was the first murder based on the Julian financial crash, which cost small investors a sum variously estimated at from $40,000,000 to $100,000,000, although the suicide and mental cases have been many.

The Rev. R. P. (Bob) Shuler is a Methodist preacher who has a radio broadcasting station, prints a monthly magazine and occasional pamphlets dealing with "hot" subjects, mostly political. He is more consistently in the public eye than any one on the Pacific Coast except Aimee Semple McPherson, with whom he does not always dwell in brotherly accord.

Shuler's Position.

On the defendant's person is claimed and denied to have been a radical pamphlet by Shuler entitled "The Julian Thieves." This is being held as possible evidence that it may have inflamed Keaton, brooding over his lost fortune. Shuler says the book was planted. Other charges injected into the case are that the police received mysterious instructions to "keep Shuler out of it," whereupon the cops lost their memories and "could not be sure" about anything in relation to the treatise.

City Prosecutor Nix talked on a radio and advised the public to be calm and not prejudiced against Shuler. Reform Mayor Porter, who was supported by Shuler, promptly fired Nix, who countered with a charge that Shuler is the real Mayor of Los Angeles.

A Mass Meeting Called.

An anti-Shuler mass meeting has been called for Friday night in a large auditorium and is sponsored by a committee of prominent and near-prominent citizens. Shuler announced today that he would hold a mass meeting of his own Sunday afternoon that would "crush the forces now arrayed against him" among which he cites "a powerful publisher with a movie affinity."

Today the embroglio moved into the State Governorship contest when the Rev. Bob declared over his radio that the battle is being financed by anti-Fitts forces, Fitts being the parson's candidate for Governor. Adding to the excitement, E. O. Sykes of the Federal Radio Commission, who is here, announced that an official inquiry into Shuler's broadcasting activities will be made in September. Back of it all are threats of another recall movement against the Mayor. It is an amazing and complicated hot weather stew in which the public has sharply taken sides and which promises a lot of action before culminating in Keaton's trial and the primary election.

ARIZONA IS ANNOYED AT BOULDER DAM CASE

Feels California Got More Than Her Share in Allotment of Water and Power.

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LOS ANGELES, Cal., July 23.—Arizona has a well-developed "mad" at California because she (Arizona) professes to believe that Boulder Dam water and power is inequitably allocated. A good deal of this irritation is fostered and kept simmering for political reasons and well-informed business interests of the Valentine State are perfectly cognizant of the circumstance that actual work upon the great project and its eventual completion will mean new capital, new outlets for labor and produce and new development opportunities in a proportionate degree to that enjoyed by California.

Arizona, through her official family, protests that she will have the law on California yet, but just the same, and notwithstanding the $10,000,000 Boulder Dam starting fund made available by Congress, will put forces to work which, in the course of time, will protect both States from flood, furnish a large domestic and irrigation water supply and provide cheap power for the interior. Obviously many of the millions of which the dam is to cost will remain in Arizona.

States Economic Twins.

Arizona and California are essentially a single economic unit, and in spite of efforts to keep them apart and to arouse bad feeling between them they will remain economic twins. Both are States of great resources. They can go far as a team, and when a spirit of cooperation becomes predominant the people on both sides of the border will come to a realization that their interests are essentially the same and that both will benefit from anything that helps either.

From the Californian's viewpoint there is not a single product of Arizona's farm or mines, factories or smelters that is not salable on the Coast, and the more people there are in California the better for Arizona. Any construction that will result in adding 1,000,000 or more to the population of the coastal region gives 1,000,000 or more additional customers to the neighboring State; means more tourists, more development. Conversely, any obstacle in the path of progress for the one is a similar obstacle to the other.

VIEWS OF AMERICA: CANADA ENDS A STIRRING CAMPAIGN

CANADA WINDS UP ELECTIONS BATTLE

Campaign Turned From Tariff Issue to Unemployment by Conservative Strategy.

LIBERALS THUS DAMAGED

But the Government Party Sees No Opposition Strong Enough to Produce Its Overthrow.

By V. M. KIPP.

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

OTTAWA, Ont., July 23.—Canadian breathe a vast sigh of relief as they realize that the campaign preceding the general election is in its very last stages. For two months the floor—and the microphone—have been held by an army of orators, organizers and propagandists, one division viewing the situation with alarm and the other pointing with pride. On Monday all these people will have completed their tasks, for good or ill, and those of the 4,000,000 qualified electors who take the trouble to vote will proceed to select the 245 members of the next House of Commons.

The campaign has developed along curious lines. Prime Minister Mackenzie King planned an election on the tariff, the increase in the scope of the British preference, the establishment of certain countervailing duties against the United States and all other foreign countries. That, coupled with the general record of the Liberal Administration for the last nine years, was to be the issue.

R. B. Bennett, the Conservative leader, fighting his first electoral battle, had other opinions. He attacked the government on its tariff policy, but in most of his addresses he gave first place to the question of unemployment—to which the Liberal leader had not given even a mention in his keynote speech.

Promised Remedies.

So it has come about that more attention has been paid the state of jobless Canadians and ways and means of rescuing them from their present condition than to any other subject and if the government is defeated on Monday—a contingency which is not nearly so improbable as it seemed two months ago—unquestionably it will be for the reason that Mr. Bennett's scheme of a special session of Parliament to deal with unemployment has proved more impressive than Mr. King's promise of a conference of experts. Justly or not, the government is paying the penalty for the present depression in trade and industry and it is likely Mr. King regrets he did not defer the election until next year, as was his privilege.

Mr. King and his supporters, insofar as possible, have sought to turn the argument from the dangerous issue of unemployment into the safer and more idealistic channels of empire trade and national development. The Prime Minister in a recent address carefully avoided use of the words reprisal or retaliation in discussing the countervailing duties against the United States, but he declared the government's policy had been inspired by what was considered the unfairness of the United States tariff and so steps were taken intended to provide the Dominion with more settled markets within Empire lines.

Changed Positions.

Mr. King's principal newspaper supporter, The Toronto Globe, for days has carried across its front page the slogan "Let Uncle Sam go his way; our way is with John Bull," and has followed this plea by urging in its most moving language that the Liberals be returned to power so that the forward step taken by the Liberals in building up the empire within itself may be followed up vigorously at the coming imperial conference in London.

Cynical observers have not failed to point out that in 1911, when the Liberals went down to defeat on the issue of reciprocity with the United States, it was the Conservatives who declared vehemently against any "truck or trade with the Yankees" and they wonder if the argument will serve the Liberals as well now as it did the Conservatives then.

Mr. Bennett's reply to all this is that much as he loves the empire he puts Canada in first place and by so doing he believes he best serves the empire as a whole. He would grant preference to empire goods only on the provision of compensating advantages to this country, and he would frame the general tariff without regard to what is done in Washington, but having regard solely to the requirements of Canadian business and industry. There is more sentiment to the Liberal appeal and it remains to be seen which argument most has impressed the electors.

Another feature of the campaign has been the part taken by provincial Premiers. Five of the nine Provinces have Conservative Governments and their weights and influences have been thrown behind Mr. Bennett to give him a not inconsiderable impetus. Premier Ferguson of Ontario has been the most aggressive, and he has attacked the Liberal administration in a long series of meetings throughout his own Province, principally on the St. Lawrence water policy on a statement made by Mr. King in Parliament that he would not give "a five-cent piece" to any Tory Government for unemployment relief.

Premier Anderson of Saskatchewan got into the contest rather belatedly, but made up for the delay by the vehemence of his criticism. The two Conservative maritime Premiers, Rhodes of Nova Scotia and Baxter of New Brunswick, and Premier Tolmie of British Columbia, were less active in their support of Mr. Bennett, but perhaps equally effective.

Liberal Provinces.

Premier King's friends are in power in only two Provinces, Quebec and Prince Edward Island. Premier Taschereau of the former Province was silent until near the close of the campaign, when he let it be known in no uncertain way that he was anxious to see a Liberal victory. Prince Edward Island continued silent. The dominant United Farmers of Alberta and Progressives of Manitoba preserved a diplomatic impartiality, although there is little doubt they would welcome the return to power of the present administration.

To a very large extent the brunt of the national campaign has been borne by the two leaders. Members of Mr. King's Cabinet, and frontbenchers from whom Mr. Bennett will select his Ministers if he is returned, for the most part have done little traveling. The leaders have visited every Province and, taking full advantage of radio chains, they have spoken to their fellow-Canadians frequently and at length. Both, in the opinions of their followers, have done extremely effective work. Those who claim to be unprejudiced, however, give credit to Mr. Bennett for having forced unemployment to the front as a major issue and, in that matter, for putting the government on the defensive.

For the 245 places there are 545 candidates in the field, so 300 of them are due for disappointment. Each candidate has posted a deposit of $200, which is forfeited to the Dominion treasury if he fails to poll at least half the votes of the winner in the constituency. Two members were elected by acclamation—Robert Gardiner, bachelor leader of the Alberta United Farmer group, and Henri Bourassa of La Belle, Quebec, who used to be a fiery Nationalist and now sits as an independent Liberal, tamed and quiescent.

The Prime Minister is a candidate in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, a perfectly safe seat. Mr. Bennett is running in Calgary, which he represented in the last Parliament as the only Conservative from the prairies. His place also is in no danger. Both leaders are closing their campaigns in the capital

Party Claims.

It is a case where predictions are attended with peculiar difficulties. When the old Parliament was dissolved the government triumphant in the appeal the Dunning budget seemed to have made on the people, there were few even among the Conservatives who believed they had any real hope of success. But, as has been intimated, the situation was altered somewhat. Conservatives are thoroughly convinced that they will ride into power on unemployment, a desire for tariff stability and the general tendency to blame the government of the day for the recession in business and prosperity.

Liberals, who held 135 seats in the last Parliament to 90 held by Conservatives, admit privately that their majority may be reduced, but they will not concede that there is any serious danger of an upset, as they feel that in an emergency they might count on the allegiance of United Farmer and Progressive members from Western Canada.

The opposition must gain thirty-five seats to hold a bare majority over all in the House, and ingenious tables are worked out to show how this may be accomplished by breaking into the solid Quebec Liberal bloc by capturing the majority of seats in Saskatchewan and Manitoba and picking up the odd place in the maritime. There is nothing impossible in it, even greater upsets have been recorded in Canadian history, but it implies a rising tide of public indignation, directed against the government, of which there are few outstanding signs at the present time.

To this observer it appears that the Conservatives have good reason to expect a larger group than in the last Parliament, but one which will fall short of a majority and will leave the government in Mr. King's hands.

London Critics Differ on the Merits Of the Byrd Expedition's Film Record

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 24.—The film record of Rear Admiral Byrd's Antarctic expedition, "With Byrd at the South Pole," first shown here this week, had a mixed reception at the hands of the British press. Some newspapers hailed it as a stirring epic, while others accused it of vulgarizing the South Pole.

The adverse criticism is not directed against Byrd or his party, but lays the blam upon the Hollywood method of presentation. "One would have supposed the Antarctic Plateau would have rejected the atmosphere of studios," says The London Times, "but Paramount has marvelously subdued it—spilt polysyllabic heroics over it, decorated it with sentimental ribbons, trodden it with captions, tickled it with humor, supplied it with letters from home and photographs of the explorer's children on croquet lawns in Massachusetts—with everything except, by some unaccountable omission, a love interest; has, in brief, found it snow and left it slush."

The Morning Post asserts that the picture well reveals the "peculiar mentality of Hollywood and those who serve it. For those, however, who have in memory the dignified and profoundly affecting record of the Scott Expedition, it must be confessed these escapades turn the whole affair into something of a circus."

The Manchester Guardian scores the "curious layer of vulgarity over it," adding, "there is much beauty but little grandeur in it, and in these days of widespread polar interest we surely can ask for a little more plain science even if we have to call it plain to insure that its romance shall not be injured and decorated."

On the other hand The Daily Mail ranks the film as the "most awesome recital of heroism the screen has yet afforded," and The Evening Standard calls it "beautiful, stirring and fascinating."

VIRGINIA DEMOCRATS LOOK FOR A VICTORY

Chances Good to Regain Two of Three Congressional Seats Lost in 1928.

ONE RACE STILL IN DOUBT

Republican Incumbent, Lankford, Has Strong Hold on Voters in Norfolk District.

By VIRGINIUS DABNEY.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

RICHMOND, Va., July 23.—With the approach of the Democratic primary on Aug. 5 Virginians are giving considerable thought to the question of whether the three Congressional districts which were carried by the Republicans in the Hoover landslide of 1928 will return to the arms of Miss Democracy this year.

Indications are that at least two of them will do so. The Gubernatorial contest of 1929, in which John Garland Pollard defeated William Moseley Brown, Republican anti-Smith coalition candidate, by the second largest majority in Virginia history was convincing evidence to many that the State had gone Republican the previous year on the twin issues of religion and rum, and that in subsequent contests with these two issues, and particularly that of religion, eliminated, the Old Dominion and its traditionally Democratic districts would demonstrate that they had not permanently gone over to the G. O. P.

The three Congressional districts that were carried by the Republicans in 1928 are the Second, or Norfolk-Suffolk District; the Seventh, or Shenandoah Valley District, and the Ninth, or Southwestern Virginia District. The other seven districts remained loyal to the Democratic party, although the margin was very slim in several instances.

Two Favorable Districts.

It is generally agreed by unbiased observers that the Seventh District will pretty certainly return to the Democratic fold next November. Representative J. A. Garber, incumbent, defeated his Democratic opponent, T. W. Harrison, who was seeking re-election, by only 234 votes in 1928. Former Judge John W. Fishburne of Charlottesville is the Democratic standard-bearer this year and will oppose Garber in November. In addition to the fact that the Seventh is normally Democratic, it is the district of former Governor Harry F. Byrd, who is tremendously popular there and who will make every effort to bring about Judge Fishburne's election.

Besides, the Shenandoah Valley, making up the district, is one of the principal apple-growing regions of the United States, and the recent apple embargo announced from Great Britain is thought to have injured Republican chances of success, since it is interpreted as a reprisal for the administration's tariff bill.

It is also regarded as quite probable that John W. Flannagan of Bristol will carry the Democratic standard to victory over Joseph C. Shaffer of Wytheville, Republican incumbent from the Ninth District of Southwest Virginia. Representative Shaffer was prevailed upon to stand for re-election after C. Bascom Slemp has refused the nomination, following several months of reflection.

Why Slemp Declined.

It is commonly felt that the main reason why Mr. Slemp decided not to make the race was that he feared the outlook this year in the district is not propitious for his party. Mr.

Thus Democratic prospects in the Seventh and Ninth Districts are decidedly rosy at this time. Such is not the case in the Second, or Norfolk-Suffolk District, however. Down there the Democrats shake their heads sadly and mutter that all is not well. They are frank to say that they do not know what will be the outcome in November, when Representative Menalcus Lankford, Republican incumbent, comes up for re-election. Indications are that the vote will be close. This is true despite the fact that the district had been safely Democratic for many years prior to 1928.

Factors in Election.

Several factors have combined to reduce the prospects of Democratic success in the Ninth District. In the first place, Mr. Lankford is admired and respected by his constituents. In the second place, he has convinced many of them that a Republican Congressman can obtain more Federal aid for the development of Hampton Roads than a Democratic Congressman. In the third place, the Democrats of the district are disorganized and demoralized by intra-party feuds.

Their candidate has not yet been chosen. Judge Fishburne will have no opposition in the primary next month for the nomination from the Seventh District, and Mr. Flannagan was named in convention by the Ninth District democracy. But three aspirants will fight it out in the Second in the August primary. They are former Representative Joseph T. Deal; Mrs. Sarah Lee Fain, former member of the House of Delegates, and W. W. Vellines, member of the House.

Tom Thumb Golf Survives Test of Virginia Blue Laws

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

RICHMOND, Va., July 23.—"Demi-tasse" golf does not violate the blue laws of Virginia, according to the verdict of a jury in Roanoke. It is illegal in the Old Dominion to operate poolrooms on the Sabbath or to open the theatres, but Tom Thumb golf may be carried on without molestation from the authorities, according to this decision.

The miniature links are operated in Roanoke only on Sunday after church hours. The practice of Sunday operation is not State-wide, however.

In the Roanoke case defenders of Sunday operation argued that it was unfair to forbid devotees of the mashie and niblick to play on a miniature course when full-sized links throughout the Commonwealth are crowded every Sunday from morning until night.

TEXAS DEMOCRATS OBJECT TO PRIMARY

Election System Is Confusing and Many Consider It to Be a Total Failure.

By IRVING S. TAUBKIN.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

DALLAS, Texas, July 23.—Texas Democrats are perspiring and cussing freely these days. The first primary has been an ordeal for most of them. The second or run-off primary election is not until Aug. 23, and until then the argument is close as to whether the heat or politics is worse. Texas Democrats are disgusted with the confused and confusing primary election system which the State, they believe unfairly, fastens on them. They are thinking, like Joe Bailey, that the direct primary is a failure, that the party and the State can exist only by representative government because pure Democracy is the bunk.

Texas Democrats are talking about having a State machine. There are those who smile at this. They recall the hectic days of 1928 with all the haranguing against Tammany and its menace. But within these last few weeks the wish has often been expressed that the party here might be free enough of what is felt to be unwarranted State domination to have its own Tammany-like control over internal party affairs.

Primary Under Fire.

Legislation is already written, and a fight in the Legislature, which convenes in January, is already being mapped out to reform the Terrell election laws. Most of it which has been heard would do away with the direct primary, but would not return entirely to the old convention system. What will probably come about will be one of those well-known amalgamations combining the best features of each. It is probable that most of the State's progressive element, supported by the newspapers, will join in the fight.

What has mainly disturbed party leaders is the fact that two extremes in politics continue to be able to exert commanding positions in State affairs because of the blocks of votes which they control, all within party ranks, although the party has repeatedly repudiated them. These are State Senator Thomas B. Love and former Governor James E. Ferguson. Tom Love's very name is anathema to old-line and regular Democrats, especially since two years ago, when he led the fight against Al Smith. Farmer Jim, impeached, is without political rights in his own name and continues to use his wife as a foil. Fergusonism in some homes, like the Tammany Tiger in others, frightens little children to bed.

The Desire for Change.

After the 1928 election there was a great desire to change the election laws in order that the party bolters might be punished. Legislation aimed at barring them from the primaries was killed by Governor Dan Moody's veto. The to and fro between the regulars and the bolters, between those who wanted to placate the bolters and those who wanted to punish them, was probably what kept sane thought from achieving worth-while reform in primary legislation. Now, however, leaders everywhere demand it; except, of course, those like Love and Ferguson, who profit by the present status of things.

The objection to the present legislation is that it prevents the party from control of purely party questions. Former Lieut. Gov. T. W. Davidson put it this way: "A stage has been reached in the party where there is no test for Democracy. A man may believe anything, advocate anything. He has just to call himself a Democrat and he is eligible for election." And he points out further how Chicago's Big Bill Thompson or Oscar De Priest could come to Texas, and having satisfied residence requirements, could enter the Democratic primaries.

Davidson's Proposal.

Governor Davidson also points out that expedience dictates the votes of most Texas Democrats, especially in this election. The desire is not to vote for some one so much as to vote against some one. He advocates some manner of preferential ballot so that the second choice would be given a chance. Cone Johnson, for more than a quarter of a century a political war horse here and now a member of the State Highway Commission, also opposes the direct primary and says that he hasn't really voted for his first, second or even third choice in years.

Although he is accused of being academic, Governor Davidson does have practical ideas. He favors, for instance, a group of tried and true Democrats banding themselves together to restore the purposes, aims and traditions of the party. He wants a Tammany without its vices, a permanent party headquarters and an unceasing educational campaign. He says also that money for these purposes is available in Texas, and he means to work to bring it about.

PITTSBURGH FACES A PINCHOT REVOLT

His Followers See Victory in Any Case and Some Would Prefer Him as Independent.

PARTY MACHINE OBDURATE

Democratic Leaders Urge All Wets to Rally to the Support of Their Ticket.

By WILLIAM T. MARTIN.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

PITTSBURGH, Pa., July 23.—Whatever form the State campaign is to take finally, the Pinchot forces of Allegheny County are sounding a note for real party control and leadership. They point out that in spite of his winning the Governorship eight years ago, Pinchot throughout his term was viewed practically as an outsider by the State Republican organization. Now, as generally known, there still is a test in the Supreme Court to determine whether he is to be placed on the Republican ticket as the Gubernatorial nominee this Fall. Technical objection has been raised to the perforation of ballots in Luzerne County as a safeguard against the introduction of fraudulent ballots.

Should the ballots of Luzerne, in which Pinchot had a plurality of some 26,000, be thrown out, then Francis Shunk Brown would be the Republican nominee. This case is to be taken up by the court on Aug. 19. Meanwhile the Pinchot forces have prepared plans for the launching of an independent party if the decision should be adverse to them. Some of them are at no pains to conceal that they really would welcome an adverse decision, declaring that the issue that would be given them by the rejection of the results of the primary on a technicality would elect Pinchot by 200,000.

The Republican Stand.

Certain of the organization Republican leaders see the possibility of that and also embarrassment for the other Republican nominees. They counsel abandonment of the fight on Pinchot within the party, but the Philadelphia organization in the main continues obdurate. In the meantime Pinchot was denied the usual courtesy shown Gubernatorial nominees of being allowed to name the State chairman of the party. Some of his followers declare that this indicates that, no matter if the court does declare him the nominee, the organization would attempt again to refuse him recognition in its counsels.

This naturally irritates his followers, and particularly in the numerous counties, such as Allegheny, that gave him his plurality in the primary. A number of them are now declaring: "We have the votes and are assured of victory, so why permit any minority elements to dictate to us or snub us in organization matter? We have seen too many independent victories wasted in that manner. If need be, an entirely new party in the State should be formed."

That may sound a bit wild, but there is some history to support it. The Progressives carried the State strongly in the party split of 1912, but it was not long until the Old Guard Republicans were again dominating. For several years lately the independents have been smashing organization slates in this county, but are still without recognition in the party counsels. Colonel Charles C. McGovern, the Pinchot leader of Western Pennsylvania, had to reach the minority county commissionership through an independent party in 1927, and it is indicated that if he seeks re-election next year—which he is generally expected to do—he will have to pursue the same method.

Independent Strength.

This has now put in circulation stories that the independent element will no longer be content with one commissionership, but will go after nothing less than control of the board. Suggestions for a running mate for McGovern already are being heard. It is pointed out that as the chief representative of Pinchot in his part of the State, McGovern now has political prestige that can scarcely be ignored.

Reference to the commissionership also brings up the case of the Democratic party. It held the minority commissionership here for many years. It has hopes of getting it back next year through a combination with Republican liberals. In fact, the Democratic leaders argue that if logic is to have any place in the politics of the State, the wets all should unite on the Democratic ticket, committed unqualifiedly against prohibition. There has been work toward this end, but the results have not yet been announced. This logic is emphasized further by the fact that some of the dry Democrats, including Vance C. McCormick, former Democratic National Chairman, and his two Harrisburg newspapers, already have turned in for Pinchot.

The only clear note of the whole situation is that the independents seem to be conscious of being in the saddle. They deny, however, that their thought is to be expressed by any such terms as "to the victors belong the spoils." They say that they want all the power to which they are entitled "to create a legacy of service for the State."

CANADA BOWS TO PROVINCES

Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba Now Rule Their Own Resources

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

SASKATOON, Canada, July 15.—July 11, 1930, is a date which every Western Canadian schoolboy will have to learn. On that day King George gave royal assent to a bill which gives to Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta control of their own Crown lands, minerals, water power and other natural resources.

Up till now the ownership and management of the prairie domain have been vested in the Dominion. The transfer gives the three Western Provinces equal status with the other six partners in the federal union.

Canada's Constitution, the British North America act, is a statute of the British Parliament and can only be changed at Westminster. The British House of Commons acts almost automatically on requests from Canada for amendments. The House passed the measure making the Prairie Provinces landowners early this month. King George's signature completed the formality, closing a controversy that dates from 1870 in Manitoba and from 1905 in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

"Racket" in Coyote Scalps Sent for Kansas Bounties

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

TOPEKA, Kan., July 26.—The State Attorney General is humping mad.

Eighty-five county clerks in the State have paid out $50,000 for coyote scalps whose owners never saw the Kansas prairies. Four men are under arrest in Graham County for this new form of racket. The scalps were bought in New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas, according to the Attorney General, and sent to Kansas, where the "racketeers" in various counties turned in the scalps to the county clerks. Kansas pays a $1 bounty on coyote scalps.

It is believed that 50,000 scalps have been sold in this way and there has not been that many coyotes in Kansas in the last fifteen years.

MAINE'S CAMPAIGN IS SLOW IN STARTING

But a Short and Crisp Contest Is Promised Before the September Election.

By F. LAURISTON BULLARD.

Editorial Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES

BOSTON, July 22.—With the general election only a few weeks ahead for a Governor and other State officers, a Senator and a full delegation of Representatives, the voters of Maine, and more especially the Republican voters, manifest less interest in politics this Summer than in any other campaign season in years. Republican editors remind their readers that the national party needs an impressive endorsement in the barometer State which votes two months before the rest of the forty-seven. Republican leaders warn their followers that Democratic candidates are far more aggressive than usual and may manage to make a much better showing than in many years before. But the rank and file appear indifferent, intent on other matters, many perhaps a bit resentful over the outcome of the clash between the radical and conservative elements in the party.

Nor will there be much activity in politics until the special session of the Legislature convenes in Augusta on Aug. 5. Nearly every politician in the State will be there and, while the actual session may last only a day or two, there probably will be enough momentum generated to get under way at last with what should be a campaign as crisp as it must be short. It is, of course, the size of the Democratic vote which will be of greatest interest in the outcome.

The Future of Brewster.

The principal topic of political speculation now has to do with the future of former Governor Brewster. Maine wonders what the stormy petrel of Pine Tree politics will do now that he is out of the running. Will he go back to private life and the practice of the law and watch for openings? In the present campaign nobody sees much for him to do except to observe the spectacle from the sidelines, but Maine learned long ago that Brewster always will bear watching.

Senator Hale defeated him for the upper chamber at Washington in 1928 by 35,000. When he lost that nomination in the primaries he was assumed to be down and out. But in the referendum on the exportation of hydroelec power in 1929 Brewster, almost alone among the political, business and educational forces of the State, made a rousing campaign against exportation. When the people sustained his position he became a more formidable candidate than ever before. To get rid of the charge that too much of Maine's political prestige centred in Portland, he removed his residence to Dexter. In the June primaries, however, he was defeated for the Senatorial nomination by Wallace H. White, 47,000 to 40,000.

White is a grandson of the late Senator Frye, and has been elected seven times to Congress from the Second District. As Maine is due to lose one of her four Representatives under the new apportionment, and this district will be divided, White had his political future at stake in the primary campaign.

A Wet's Campaign.

A curious feature of the campaign was the candidacy of a Portland business man, Dugald B. Dewar, who ran on a wet platform, about the first Republican who has dared to take that position in a State-wide campaign. He declared himself ready to substitute the Ontario system, the Swedish system, or any other system, for the kind of prohibition Maine is getting. And, what also is remarkable, he polled 7,000 votes. In this connection it should not be overlooked that Senator Gould, who decided not to seek a renomination, intimated in 1927 that he had no sympathy with the dry cause, a sentiment which contributed much to the merriment of the nation but did not endear him to the majority of the Maine voters.

The Democratic candidate for Governor, Edward C. Moran Jr. of Rockland, running against Governor Gardiner, who seeks a second term, opened his campaign formally in a slam-bang speech before the Bangor Grange a few days ago. To the vexed question of highway construction he devoted his major attention. Maine has 25,000 miles of road in all and has spent $98,000,000 on her highways, yet has but 121 miles of concrete and 279 miles of bituminous macadam permanent roads to show for that great sum. Maryland has spent only $86,000,000 and has more than 2,000 miles of roads.

Democratic Thunder.

In per capita ranking Maine is the sixth most expensively governed State in the Union and has the fifth highest State debt. These citations indicate what may be the tactics of the Democrats in their appeals to the electorate. Waste, extravagance, the high cost of government, one person in every 324 in State employ, counting seasonal highway employes—this may prove to be a profitable platform. Anyway the Republican managers are showing a lot of interest in what Moran is doing. The Democratic candidate for the Senate is Frank H. Haskell, also described as "able and aggressive."

Protest of Artist Brings Case Before New York's Public Service Commission.

By PHILIP W. LOWRY.

The people of the Au Sable River Valley in the beautiful Adirondack region are waging a battle against heavy odds with the Delaware & Hudson Railroad Corporation. The outcome may not only determine the continued existence of this community of some 10,000 souls, but may also vitally affect throughout the entire State of New York the relations of all the people to its railroads.

Surrounded by mountains, served only by old, worn-out and tortuous roadways, this valley has for more than fifty years had as its only rail outlet a railway twenty-three and a half miles long, extending from the village of Au Sable Forks on the boundary of Essex and Clinton Counties to the City of Plattsburg on Lake Champlain.

History of Road.

In 1866 a railroad corporation known as the Whitehall & Plattsburg Railroad Company was organized to construct and operate for the conveyance of persons and property. The project was supported not only by the individual subscriptions of the people of this community but also, on account of the great expense attendant upon its construction, by a tax levied in 1867 by the Legislature upon all the people of the State. Following a series of mergers the branch was acquired by the Delaware & Hudson Company, whose operating company is the Delaware & Hudson Railroad Corporation.

This little branch had always been operated as a passenger line until, in 1884, the J. J. Rogers Company, whose old iron mill in Au Sable Forks had been converted into a pulp paper mill, extended the road through the village to its mill on the west side of Au Sable Forks in order to obtain freight service to Plattsburg. Until October, 1928, passenger, mail and express service was maintained by a two train per day round trip. In that month the Delaware & Hudson Company reduced the schedule to one train per day, leaving Plattsburg early in the morning for Au Sable Forks and returning to Plattsburg by 10 o'clock in the forenoon. Passenger traffic was cut down by two-thirds. The people of the valley who wished to go to Plattsburg could not return on the same day. The women who desired to shop in Plattsburg were faced with the alternative of either not going at all or staying overnight in Plattsburg, only twenty-three miles away. Salesmen who brought commerce into the valley stopped coming because they were compelled to waste two days on account of an enforced stay overnight in Au Sable Forks to do business which could be completed in a few hours.

Trains Dropped.

Finally on Sept. 9, 1929, without warning and without the knowledge or consent of the Public Service Commission, the railroad suddenly abandoned all passenger, mail and express service on the branch. The railroad predicated its act upon a loss of some $10,000 a year, but total revenue derived from freight, passenger, mail and express service initiating on the branch amounted to more than $413,000 a year.

In the year 1927 there had settled in this valley the artist, author and explorer, Rockwell Kent.

Kent, on returning to Au Sable Forks in late December, 1929, made an immediate protest to the Governor of the State of the action of the railroad. The Governor turned the complaint over to the Public Service Commission, whose members apprised the Governor that they had never even heard of the discontinuance of the service. They advised the Governor that they would at once direct the railroad to make proper application therefor.

But it was not until Kent presented a formal, legally drawn complaint to the commission that it took action and that was simply ordering a hearing at which the railroad was privileged to present its reasons for abandoning service. These hearings have been held and are still being held. In the meanwhile, however, no passenger, mail and express service on this branch is being operated,

Many Join Battle.

Although in the beginning Kent was in the position of fighting the railroad single-handed, the action of the company and the cumulative effect on the daily lives, persons and property of the inhabitants of the valley and the principles involved have brought to him the support of many people of this Adirondack region.

The writer, after an exhaustive search, has been unable to find a single instance in this State where a railroad has discontinued an entire service without previous application to the commission. The issue presented is considered of the utmost importance for the reason that if a railroad may discontinue an entire service without even the knowledge of the only body delegated by the people to assure to them service the commission ceases in the first instance to be the judge of the public convenience and necessity for such service and deliberately surrenders that fundamental function to the railroad itself.

"Clean Journalism Appreciated"

The success The New York Times has attained is not only a tribute to the management of the newspaper, but, better still, is proof conclusive that the people appreciate high-class journalism. To be clean of speech, upright in deportment and fearless in meeting every issue are fine attributes for any individual to have and are especially valuable assets of a newspaper. I consider The Times to have them in a high degree.

TRENDS AND TIDES IN MODERN EDUCATION

TEACHER DEMAND AND THE SUPPLY

Shortage or Surplus Depends on the Wages and Training Taken as Standard.

SURVEY NOW IN PROGRESS

Preliminary Findings of Inquiry Being Conducted by the National Education Association.

Is there an oversupply of teachers throughout the country? The National Education Association is conducting a two-year survey to find out. Some of the preliminary results are discussed in the following article written by the director of the association's research department.

By JOHN K. NORTON.

Since 1920, when there was a serious shortage of teachers, enrolments of teacher-training institutions have increased considerably more rapidly than the number of school positions in the United States. Last year there were approximately 300,000 students preparing for teaching, as compared with one-third that number ten years ago. Meanwhile, the average length of teaching service, particularly in the cities, has substantially increased. In some communities, particularly those paying the higher salaries, there is a larger number of applicants than there are vacant positions.

But these facts do not justify the conclusion that there is a general oversupply of teachers. There are nearly 1,000,000 school positions in the United States. Even if the average length of teaching service were ten years—and it is undoubtedly less than this—it would require 100,000 new teachers each year for replacements alone. To produce this number of graduates yearly, assuming a three-year course, teacher training institutions would have to enroll something over 300,000 students.

Undersupplied Communities.

Also for every community which has an oversupply of applicants for teaching service there is another which cannot obtain teachers who are qualified for their work. These communities, because of the low salaries they pay, are able to obtain teachers only through special examinations, which are made sufficiently easy so that people with practically no professional preparation may pass.

If one were to guess as to what the general situation is in the country at present—and no one can do more than guess, considering the present lack of reliable facts—it would appear that there are more teachers with two or more years of professional preparation beyond high school than there are positions paying salaries which such teachers will accept.

On the other hand, there are literally hundreds of thousands of teaching positions which pay such meager salaries that the only teachers who can be induced to take them are those with little training and fitness for the work. In other words, if at the beginning of the 1930-31 term it became the general policy to employ no new teachers except those who had completed a professional course, and to pay salaries which such people would accept, there would probably be an immediate shortage of teachers.

A Question of Standards.

The present situation as it affects the supply of teachers can be made plain by the following supposition. Let us suppose that it were the practice in the United States for a community, whenever it did not desire to pay the current physicians' fees, to give an easy examination to persons who were willing to practice at a reduced wage, and thereby to make it legal for them to write M. D. after their names. Competent physicians would leave such a community. Untrained doctors would take their places. The result in the country as a whole would be an oversupply of doctors. Yet this is almost exactly the way in which the nation's teaching personnel is now being recruited.

In the light of these conditions, what action does public policy dictate for a community? Some communities are advocating the reduction of teachers' salaries. Obviously, this is not the answer in places already paying such low salaries that they cannot obtain properly prepared teachers. But how about the larger cities where salaries are higher? There are people who are willing to teach for lower salaries. Why should we disregard the law of supply and demand?

We should not disregard the law of supply and demand. But what is the demand? Are the best of those who are now willing to teach in the large cities more competent than their calling demands? Or do we need even more capable teachers than present salaries obtain? If the latter is the case, then it is folly to think of reduction.

Teachers' salaries in the large cities, in my opinion, should not only be maintained at present levels, but in some instances should be increased so that teaching may compete on an even basis with other professions.

An Occupational Plan.

Accompanying the establishment of this adequate economic foundation for teaching, there needs to be developed an intelligent occupational plan for this important public service. Before such a plan can be made, it will be necessary regularly to assemble the facts as to the teaching needs of each State. We shall have to know not only the gross number of school vacancies which occur each year but also the character of these vacancies. How many elementary school teachers are needed annually? How many high school teachers? How many people will be needed to teach science and mathematics, and each of the other subject groups? How many new supervisory and executive officers are needed by the schools each year?

Several States are already laying the foundation for a program of occupational planning for teaching similar to that described above. In addition, two nation-wide agencies are focusing attention on the movement. To give it impetus is the principal purpose of the study of teacher supply and demand now being conducted by the National Education Association. The Federal investigation of teacher training which has just been launched by the United States Office of Education will also consider this problem.

The Urban College Versus the Country

Respective Merits of Each Are Stated by Two Educators.

Which is the more valuable influence upon the maturing boy or girl—the college in the city, at the vortex of our complex civilization, or that in the country, with its own close-knit academic community and its contacts with nature? The relative merits of these two kinds of education are debated below by two presidents, one of an urban and one of a rural college.

That the vaunted "college life" of many of our smaller country colleges, segregated from the course of everyday existence outside, is often a narrowing and warping experience is the contention of Frederick B. Robinson, president of the College of the City of New York. He believes that youth is best educated for adult life by spending the impressionable college years at the centres where that life is most abundantly going on.

On the other hand, George Barton Cutten, president of Colgate University, argues that true culture, the objective of the college course, is obtained through such genuine rapport between the students and the professors, their intellectual guides, as is naturally evoked by the small college in isolated country surroundings. The quiet and the contact with nature and the best minds, afforded by the rural college, are a preparation for life which, he believes, cannot be equaled by the large institution in the midst of the distractions of the city.

WHAT THE CITY CAN OFFER TO STUDENTS

By FREDERICK B. ROBINSON,
President of the College of the City of New York.

Ours is now a nation of city dwellers, and the vast majority of students of college and university level either live in cities or are preparing themselves for careers which must be pursued in urban surroundings. The life they must know is the life of the city. The policies which determine the destiny of the whole nation are those formulated in these key centres.

One may regret the passing of the leisurely culture of the landed aristocracy and the gentle pastoral life which nurtured its literary and speculative geniuses on the trivium and quadrivium of the schoolmen of the Middle Ages. The fact remains that we are living in a dynamic period which is evolving new conceptions of the physical universe, uncovering mysteries of science with bewildering rapidity, erecting giant structures of steel, defying time and space and experimenting with new modes of political and industrial organization.

In majesty and power the culture of today both includes and far exceeds that of all previous ages, and those who would know it must be alert of mind, sure in intellectual grasp and swift in perception. Their best environment for instruction and inspiration, at the college age, is the large city.

The Urban Advantage.

We may take it for granted that the university schools of law, medicine, engineering, education, journalism, business, and in fact all professional schools except those of agriculture, animal husbandry and forestry, are most advantageously placed in a city. Though there may be some doubt concerning an urban location for undergraduate colleges of liberal arts, some reflection will indicate that for these colleges also the city is an excellent location.

The purpose of the college is to make the students informed, effective and thoughtful citizens of the world in which they are to live, and to inspire them to efforts which will contribute to the further improvement of the world. Young manhood is a period of awakening which can be well stimulated and strengthened in touch with the rich life of the city.

The faculty of the city college is ready to take advantage of the activities of the community to impart a reality and vividness to instruction that would be impossible in rural surroundings. The textbooks and laboratories of science are supplemented with actual contacts with great power houses, work in construction, factories, airports, assembly plants, acqueducts, sewage systems and all the accumulated agencies of man which apply and make obvious the use of the discoveries of science.

The sociology professor has ready at hand the establishments for the alleviation of poverty, the detection and punishment of crime, the administration of justice and the dispensing of medical relief. Problems of immigration and the assimilation of new elements in the population are made concrete. In place of bookish shadows of knowledge, he offers the facts of life to speak for themselves, to inform and to stimulate creative thought.

Presentations in Action.

Art, music, literature and the drama are presented in action as real expressions of human thought and feeling, in the words of their creators and not merely as passages from textbooks or notes from the lectures of a professor whose very circumstances of life make much of his own knowledge vague, secondary, out of date or remote from the reality of current creation.

Furthermore, city colleges have a great advantage in obtaining the services not only of men in direct contact with civilization in action, but of those who are foremost in their several fields. Although here and there exceptions are to be found, in general the ablest authorities prefer to live in large cities with easy access to the libraries, museums, experimental plants, professional clubs and publishing houses, and in touch with those who will enjoy or pay for professional services which, far from interfering with their college work, keep them in excellent form as live and interesting instructors of hero-worshiping youths. Such men are ideal guides for college students, not only in their formal exercises, but also in the extra-curriculum activities of debating societies, literary societies, biology and radio clubs, publications, orchestras and glee clubs. Their standards are those of humanity in its maturity and at its best and not those of an artificial microcosm.

The Broader Social Field.

Moreover, it is better for young men and women of college age to live with their families and have their natural church and social connections in the whole community than to be segregated and brought up in groups which have to create artificial social activities. In our own college, all students live at home, as do the majority in all urban colleges. The minority who come in from outside have access to the natural, broadening urban influences which are in sharp contrast to what in many rural institutions are narrow and distorted caricatures of human relationships.

It is not good for young people between the ages of 18 and 22 to be brought up in a separate, peculiar and presumably superior group. They develop egotisms that are hard to cure; they conceive special rules of conduct and evolve eccentric modes of thought, speech and action. It is preferable during what is at best a cocksure age to have the corrective of serious society to keep the young people in their places and to shape them to rational ideals and seemly deportment.

A community made up almost wholly of students and a similarly isolated group of teachers is to be regarded not as a desirable thing but rather a sort of necessary handicap to overcome which some careful measures should be taken. Young men starting out in life after a college course in such an environment often require much time to recover from the experience and make themselves bearable to others.

Dr. F. B. Robinson, President of the City College.

Professors in remote colleges are also at a disadvantage. They feel not only culturally starved and rejoice when they can sojourn for intellectual stimulation in a metropolis, but they deplore the lack of contact with persons other than similarly limited teachers. Of course they feel the growing tendency to become dictatorial and opinionated which is the natural result of dealing almost exclusively with those under their scholastic authority.

The Large Organization.

There can be no doubt concerning the superior intellectual contacts of a great city or of the advantages which most urban colleges have in faculty (both regular and supplementary), equipment and facilities. Often, however, such colleges have student bodies so large that individual attention is difficult. This is being remedied by organization into smaller colleges and groups within the whole and by personal work. Indeed, without such subdivision and supervision much of the richness of city and faculty resources and beneficial human contacts will be lost.

Dr. George B. Cutten, President of Colgate University.

Our colleges are not country clubs nor kindergartens for overgrown babies; they are intellectual workshops. Their prime purposes are to give the student the information and methods of the scholar, establish self-control and stimulate to independent inquiry, thought and action. Of course, those in charge of the development of young men and women must be persons of fine character, of devotion to the cause of education, and of attainment in various departments of the arts and sciences.

Such people are to be found in all colleges, rural and urban. They will play their parts regardless of the differences of local character which work with them or against them. But there is much to lead us to believe that those who labor in the well-organized college in the city will have the advantage of an environment which is admirably adapted to the production of widely informed, carefully trained citizens, who will elevate the ideals of their fellow-men and carry further the activities of advancing civilization.

A SMALL COMMUNITY AS A COLLEGE SITE

By GEORGE BARTON CUTTEN,
President of Colgate University.

In considering the comparative advantage of an urban and a rural situation for a college, one must have clearly in mind the distinction between the college giving undergraduate courses, and the university with its graduate schools of law, medicine, theology and engineering. A large urban centre is indispensable for the latter: Cornell has its medical school not in Ithaca but in New York; Northwestern has its not in Evanston but in Chicago. The college is an entirely different matter, and there are many reasons for believing that for it the rural situation is preferable.

One of the first considerations, but not by any means the most important, is that the cost both to students and to college is less in a rural community. Not only are the living costs for both faculty and students considerably less there, but because of this, it is usually necessary for the urban colleges to charge a larger tuition. The comparative expenses of the students attending college in a rural and an urban community are about as 3 to 4 respectively.

The Student and the Job.

It is said that there are more opportunities for the student to earn money in the city than in the small town; but I think we are coming to realize that it is more profitable for the student to spend his time at college in study than in washing windows. There has even been the suggestion, now that the majority of our students come from the city rather than the country and the boys do not need to have vacation in the Summer in order to work on the farms, that our vacation should run from Jan. 1 to April 1. From a financial standpoint, this would be of considerable advantage, and in the rural college the Summer is the best time of the year.

In addition to the matter of living expenses and tuition, the incidental expenses are comparatively small in the rural community, and these expenses in the year amount to considerable in a city. One must admit that where the students come from the city in which an urban college is located, and where most of them live in their own homes, the expenses to those students are less in the urban college; but in that case the college serves as a local convenience.

The Aim of the College.

This question of the advantage of situation must be finally answered according to what we conceive as the aim of the college course. If it is cultural, and this culture comes from the intercourse between students and professors, then the rural college has a considerable advantage. Here the student cannot avoid his professors, for he meets them on every occasion, outside the classroom as well as within it. It is said that the city colleges have many advantages on account of the cultural opportunities in the way of lectures, museums and similar aids to education which the city provides. The greatest value of museums is in graduate study, and we have found it far easier to bring lecturers to the rural community than to transfer the advantages of the rural college to the cities.

Not a little of the value of the college course is found in the intercourse between students. Because of the limited accommodations of a rural community, the dormitory system is a necessity, and where students live together in dormitories or in fraternity houses they naturally rub up against other students and learn the art of living together. This is not true of the students in the city, who remain in their own homes or are forced to live in boarding houses. While there is no reason why dormitories cannot be erected in the city, as a matter of fact we find comparatively fewer dormitories in urban colleges than we have in the rural ones.

In a rural settlement the college is the chief if not the only feature of the community. Thus the community has a vital interest in the college. This results in an intellectual stimulation and cultivation because most persons with whom the student comes in contact are connected with college and are in some way aiming for the same goal. It, further, calls for and really succeeds in forming a community of interest such as is impossible in an urban community; at the same time, on account of the diversity of interests in the college, it is not narrowing.

Distractions of the City.

A student thus escapes from the distractions of the large city, which while they may have some educational value are most likely to take time which could better be devoted to college interests. In the rural community the student is therefore thrown more directly upon the college for his extra-curricular as well as his curricular activities, and his participation in these is of real educational value and helps considerably to round out his training.

The question, then, in its last analysis, is one of a choice between the concentration of effort which the isolation of the rural situation forces on the student and the dissipation of energy which the distractions of the urban situation invites. Of course, some students are able to resist either or both, but the tendency of human nature is to take the line of least resistance, and we have found it of advantage in college to remove every obstacle to study and every possible sidetrack. If all the urban distractions were lectures and museums educators would interpose no objections, but unfortunately this is not so.

The urban college is almost always large, the rural college small; and this brings into relief the question of the advantages of the large and small college. Dean Briggs of Harvard used to say that the small colleges are always proclaiming the advantages of smallness in order to become larger; but this is not so at the present time, for the principal small colleges in the East have fixed a limit to their attendance so as to necessitate their remaining small colleges.

Advantages of Contacts.

On the other hand, the larger urban colleges are trying to get some of the advantages of the small colleges by their new dormitory systems. It is doubtful if these advantages can be artificially maintained as satisfactorily and beneficially as if they sprang naturally into being in the rural setting. In the small college the student from the beginning of his freshman year is more likely to meet mature professors in his courses and less likely to meet young, inexperienced instructors; this is a real advantage.

The rural situation has its advantages in other than cultural results, for not infrequently the first break that a boy makes with home is in his going to college. With the college community furnishing him with all his environment, he is quite likely to make a more satisfactory adjustment morally and socially, as well as culturally.

One cannot speak of the rural college without mentioning the indefinite, indefinable, yet very real advantage that comes from being a part of large open spaces where there is no crowding and from the opportunity to get in touch with the beauties of nature. The value that comes to both the mental and the physical health of the maturing boy from the spacious conditions with which one is surrounded in a rural college and away from so many conditions which are artificial must surely be reckoned as of supreme importance, for without these education of any and all kinds is worthless.

SCHOOLBOYS ARE AMBASSADORS, TOO

Travel Is Helping Them Know Their Fellow-Pupils in Foreign Countries.

AN ILLUMINATING SURVEY

Urbana University Ascertains the Heroes of Children in a Mid-Western Town.

By EUNICE FULLER BARNARD.

American schoolboys are not only fraternizing with English ones this Summer—one group touring the island to educate them in baseball and another recently rowing their crews on the Thames—but they are building up a kind of international youthful understanding on the Continent as well.

Out on the tree-shaded courts of the historic French Château du Montcel, near Versailles, American and French schoolboys who had never seen each other until this month are playing tennis together like old cronies these July afternoons. Twenty-five young Americans from six preparatory schools—Taft, Middlesex, Nichols, Western Reserve, Tabor Academy and Loomis Institute—are thus spending their vacations with boys selected from French schools, while other Tabor boys are similarly studying and playing at Ilfeld, an old German boarding school in the Hartz Mountains as a carefree if conscious part of a movement to establish international schoolboy rapport.

Eighteen American, twelve French, nine English and five German schools are already members of the International Schoolboy Fellowship for Better Understanding, under whose auspices this Summer fraternization is carried on. Moreover, eight American schools in a reciprocal gesture now receive English boys as guests during the regular Winter term.

"Modern communication," says the statement of the headmasters who inaugurated the fellowship, "has made travel fabulously easy, but the traveler too often brings back nothing but surface impressions. There is seldom a meeting of minds or participation in the essential life of another country. Impressionable youths are likely to take their prejudices abroad with them and bring them back intensified. Yet youth is a time of generous impulses, when lasting friendships are readily formed. Brief experience of international schoolboy exchanges convinces us that familiarity breeds esteem and not contempt.

"One English boy in an American school makes some impression on several hundred, who perhaps take through life, and, in some degree, transmit to others a different feeling toward Englishmen. One American boy in a French community for a Summer brings home a new understanding of French tradition and ideals which he communicates to his school-fellows. Friendship and tolerance are bred by intimacy, and we cannot begin too young."

The Ideals of Children.

Whether or not they reflect a national standardization of the teachings and atmosphere of our educational system, certainly surveys of school children's ideals made from time to time in various parts of the country reveal—to put it mildly—a lack of variety. East, West or South for the last few years, in town or country, wherever children have been questioned, Colonel Charles A. Lindbergh has rated as the hero first in their affections, with Henry Ford and Thomas A. Edison among the runners-up.

To this rule the recent survey of children's ideals in a typical mid-Western town, made by the Education Department of Urbana University, was no exception. As usual, too, there was a marked dearth of heroines. Helen Keller and Loretta Young were the only two contemporary women included in the leading dozen names. Indeed, the sole conspicuous change from the lists of yesteryear was the omission of the name of Calvin Coolidge. Herbert Hoover, however, scored ninth, seeming to prove that in juvenile popularity contests, at least, however satisfactory it may be to be right, it is more effective to be President.

Among the authors Longfellow, Stevenson, Zane Grey, Laura Lee Hope, Ruby M. Ayres and Louisa M. Alcott scored in that order, with such favorites of a by-gone generation as Nick Carter, Jesse James and Horatio Alger still tenaciously holding their own. The most popular magazines were not juveniles, but such highly seasoned adult fare as Mystery Stories, Wild West Stories and Love Stories. If, as the survey states, its object is to shed a suggestive beam upon school methods and curricula, these latter findings, it would seem, might prove a searchlight.

Paying as You Learn.

Whatever may be the outcome of Henry Ford's educational experiment at Sudbury, Mass., a similar but even more radical year-round school where the students also are required to work their way, has now independently developed into a full-fledged high school and junior college in Tennessee. Indeed, if present plans are consummated, it will soon add the upper college years as well. Entering with no funds, its 300 students not only earn their living within the school, but end their course with a few dollars in their pockets, according to Mrs. P. P. Claxton, wife of the former United States Commissioner of Education.

Where the Ford experiment enrolls but thirty boys, the Nashville Agricultural Normal Institute, with ten times as many students, is coeducational. Moreover, in addition to farm and mechanical work like that for which the Ford students are paid at Sudbury, it provides diversified money-earning opportunities in a printing establishment, a sanitarium of 100 beds and a food factory where fruit and vegetables are canned and bread and crackers manufactured. Thus in twenty-five or more fields, from dietetics to plumbing and stenography, it offers both paid work and incidental vocational training.

It is the belief of the school, says Mrs. Claxton, that a student can "work while he is learning" and "learn from work; and he can be taught a method of living and a philosophy of life which will carry him all the way through, at once permitting to the individual the greatest amount of service to society he is capable of giving and bringing to him the greatest possible freedom of mind, body and spirit."

"EQUAL OF ANY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD"
* * It is almost as hard to think of our solar system without the sun as of a civilized society in our day without some great newspaper. Such a publication is the mighty mirror in which the joy, the pride, the pageantry, the pathos and the restless activity of human existence in all its forms is reflected. * *
I have been reading The New York Times every day for many years, and, both as an agency for the collection and distribution of the news and as an agency for the diffusion of sound principles and thoughts, it is, in my opinion, the equal of any newspaper in the world.

SENATE'S 'BAITING' IN SPECIAL SESSION

Its Attitude to the President Was in Line With Custom It Has Long Followed.

POSITION OF MR. HOOVER

Supporters Say He Has Won, but His Legislative Victories Will Be Much Debated.

By RICHARD V. OULAHAN.

WASHINGTON, July 23.—In the closing hours of the special session which ended last Monday the Senate was true to form. In addition to ratifying the naval treaty—the particular business which President Hoover called upon it to transact when he assembled it in special session—it confirmed some nominations but balked when confronted with passing on the nominations of men chosen by the President for members of the reorganized Federal Power Commission. The outcome of that balking spirit typified the attitude which the Senate had been maintaining so long that it had become a sort of second nature.

The nominations of the power commissioners were called up for confirmation, and there was objection by one Senator, which had the effect of putting over for another day the consideration of a nomination. But the Senate was in no mood to keep the special session going even for that brief period. It adjourned until the regular session of Congress in December.

There was an important reason why the nomination of some of the power commissioners should be confirmed, for under the law for the reorganization of the commission the newly formed body was barred from functioning until at least two of the nominees had been confirmed by the Senate.

No public body is so generally berated, subjected to satire and made to feel that by many it is regarded as a joke, as is the Senate. Yet, the generality of Senators whose individual procedure is largely responsible for the poor name which it has received, are returned term after term by their constituencies, and on the face of things are regarded as superior to other Senators.

All of which is prefatory to telling something of how the Senate conducted itself in the special session just ended, and how that conduct dovetailed with the Senate's activities in the prior regular session of Congress which came on top of the extra Congressional session called by President Hoover for the purpose of enacting tariff legislation and a law for the relief of agriculture.

Outstanding in the attitude of the Senate in the special session was the irresistible tendency manifested to bait the President of the United States. That baiting process has been in vogue for the past fifteen years or so. It was practiced in the early stages of the European war. President Wilson's contemptuous and indignant reference to "a little group of willful men"—a dozen or so Senators who were able to thwart the desire of the vast majority of their fellow-members in defeating the President's recommendation authorizing the arming of American merchant ships to give them some semblance of defense from German submarine attack—brought to the front the power which could be exercised by a small Senate minority against the will of the Senate itself.

Change of Senate Rules.

Out of that denunciatory statement of President Wilson, issued on the evening of his second inaugural, came a change of the Senate rules which permitted the application of a modified form of closure on debate. The League of Nations contest saw the process of President-baiting apparently at its height, but President Coolidge, and now President Hoover, found that the process was a regular thing, a habit of which the Senate seemed unable to divest itself.

It would be giving a false impression to have it appear that the Senate is superior to the influence of popular opinion. The potency of that influence was demonstrated in the contest over the London treaty. When the resolution for the treaty's ratification was voted on last Monday the opposition could muster only a corporal's guard.

A striking feature of that vote, which illustrates one of the peculiarities of the Senate, was that seven of the nine antagonists were of President Hoover's own party, and five of these were of the regular Republican stripe. Of the pairs, nine Democrats and two Republicans were announced as favoring ratification, while the opposition represented in pairs numbered one Republican, four Democrats and one Farmer-Laborite. Of the six unpaired absentees announcement was made that four Democrats and two Republicans would have voted to ratify.

A study of these figures will not produce any definite conclusions necessary to a study of the Senate's tendencies. The process of President-baiting was more in evidence when the treaty was under consideration. A number of those who ultimately voted to ratify took occasion, through support of reservations and other measures, to weaken the treaty or discomfit the President. But in the last analysis they yielded to the knowledge or surmise that the country was for peace and, being for peace, looked to the treaty to further the cause of world tranquillity.

Request for Documents.

The President-baiting process reached its most numerous expression during the special session when the Senate adopted a resolution requesting Mr. Hoover to send to the Senate all papers and memoranda relating to the negotiation of the treaty at London.

In their hearts, the importuning Senators knew that it would be out of the question for the President to comply with this request. They were aware that the memoranda which were part of the American delegation's documentary accumulation contained confidential information, free comment and other material which, if it were exposed to public view, would have placed the United States Government in the position of betraying those with whom its emissaries dealt at London and would have hampered future intimate diplomatic intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.

In the end the President won, if one cares to see victory in the fact that he refused to comply with the Senate's request, and there was no way in which the Senate could compel him to recede from that position. His refusal was in the most courteous terms. He modified it, mild as it was, by offering to let the Senate have all the desired memoranda and other documentary material in confidence. But the Senate would have none of it; it must be privileged to make such public use of the material as it saw fit. So it got nothing, as it knew it would get nothing when it voted the request to the President.

KING VICTOR EMMANUEL

Italy's Ruler Whose Reign Has Covered Three Decades

The game of President-baiting was resumed in another form. In his response to the Senate's request, Mr. Hoover had given unqualified assurance that no secret understanding or agreement with any nation had accompanied the negotiation of the London treaty. With direct application to this, Senator Norris offered a resolution, the preamble of which was in words that were a thinly veiled suggestion that "we doubt your assurance."

This was objectionable to the President, but he had no objection to the resolution itself, which was nothing more than a statement that in ratifying the treaty the Senate did so in the understanding that there were no secret documents of understanding which directly or indirectly modified the treaty.

The firmness of the President in refusing to comply with the Senate's virtual demand for all memoranda relating to the London negotiations had its effect. The preamble of the Norris resolution was withdrawn and the unobjectionable feature of the measure was adopted. It was the only declaration accompanying the act of ratification which the Senate accepted.

Use of Firm Tactics.

The President probably came to the conclusion out of this experience that a little firmness with the Senate resulted in advantage to himself. Other Presidents had learned that.

It is hardly to be expected that the Senate has retrieved itself in the popular estimation by its ratification of the London agreement. There was nothing partisan in the treaty's consideration, with the exception of the process of the President-baiting. Senator Robinson, the Democratic floor leader, was a tower of strength to the treaty cause. Only two Democratic Senators voted against ratification. The action of the Senate is pleasing to the country, judging by the fact that the treaty had an overwhelming support of the nation's press. But the disposition to hold the Senate in low esteem seems to be too deep-set among the American people to permit one applauded accomplishment to overcome opinion formed through a slow process of observation.

As many observers here see it, the chief trouble with the Senate does not lie in the lack of ability of its membership but in its unwillingness or impotence to control a few individual members whose tendencies are sensational and whose utterances and actions give the Senate as a whole a bad name. The manner in which witnesses were ill-treated by some of its committees and especially by its lobby investigating committee aroused indignation among the Senate's personnel—but nothing was done about it.

Special Senate Groups.

Demagogic Senators rant and rave in the chamber and make sensational accusations, but the Senate does nothing to check their effort to shatter reputations. One of the Senate's tendencies is to adopt almost any resolution which calls for an investigation. It is imbued with a spirit of intrigue which leads to the formation of special groups which retard legislation. A widespread impression of the Senate is that it is obstructive, a condition which is encouraged by the loose rules that permit a small number of Senators and sometimes even an individual Senator to defy the will of the majority.

The other side of the shield—the Senate's side—is that as "the greatest deliberative body in the world," the Senate lives up to the spirit of the rule of checks and balances on which our constitutional government is founded. Its defenders contend that through the obstructive power placed in the hands of a few Senators by the practice of unlimited debate, bad measures are prevented from being enacted and in the end the grist that comes out of the legislative mill is good grist.

In any attempt to give an idea of the country's appraisement of the Senate it is worth while emphasizing that peculiarity of the American body politic which acquits an individual Senator of responsibility for his part in actions of the Senate that tend to put it in ill repute.

Senators and the Senate.

With the Senate as a body roundly scorned or treated with contemptuous indifference by the people of a certain State (and there is a considerable number of these certain States) these same people will re-elect their own particular Senator in spite of his contribution to the acts which give rise to that self-same scorn or uncomplimentary lack of interest in the Senate's affairs. Among some observers the disposition is to believe that the generality of American voters become little aroused over Senatorial elections and go to the polls in a spirit of what's-the-use.

Whether President Hoover accomplished much or little in the two legislative sessions and the one special Senate session of the present Congress will be debated throughout the country in this year of Senatorial and Congressional contests. That, after a myriad of vicissitudes, he managed to put into law most of his legislative program, came to the country as something of a surprise, for some of the most important of the measures sponsored by him were enacted on the very closing days of the session which ended on the eve of the Fourth of July. On the face of this record his supporters contend that, in spite of a hostile Senate, the President won out.

But the opposition will have much to say to the contrary. It will pick flaws in the legislative accomplishments credited to the President. The statutes enacted will be subjected to searching analysis for the benefit of the voters. The question is whether countless numbers of the voters will be impressed either by the Hoover pros or the Hoover cons. At any rate, we are in for an interesting open season of political shooting in which much will be heard as to whether the Senate is all that it should be or the reverse.

ITALY LOOKS BACK ON 30-YEAR REIGN

Under Victor Emmanuel's Rule the Nation Has Acquired Much Territory.

A SELF-EFFACING MONARCH

The King Has Consistently Placed the Country's Welfare Ahead of His Personal Interests.

By ARNALDO CORTESI.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

ROME, July 24.—Exactly thirty years ago on the 29th of this month King Humbert was assassinated at Monza, and Victor Emmanuel, on the same day, automatically became King of Italy, over which he has since reigned with remarkable wisdom and moderation. His reign has seen stormy times, both owing to external wars and to internal unrest; but it may safely be said that he never has lost either the confidence or affection of his people. Even during the height of Italy's Social-Communist troubles, King Victor Emmanuel and Queen Helena occupied special niches in the hearts of their Italian subjects.

During the last thirty years Italy has seen many changes. Its population has risen from 32,000,000 to 42,000,000. During this time Italy has acquired the Dodecannese Islands and colonies of Tripoli and Cyrenaica by the war against Turkey in 1912. Her national territory has been increased by the addition of the Provinces of Trento, Bolzano, Fiume, Gorizia, Pola, Trieste and Zara after the World War, when Transjubiland and the oasis of Jarabub were also added to Italy's colonial possessions.

During this same period great progress has been made toward eliminating the plague of illiteracy which once infected the nation. The general standard of living has been greatly raised and general health conditions have been improved, as is shown by the steadily falling death rate. Much work has been done toward the exploitation of the country's national resources, especially as regards water power and the reclamation of marshes and waste land. The industrial activity has been multiplied many fold; the productive possibilities of the country have been enormously increased.

Difficulties of the Reign.

About half of Victor Emmanuel's reign has been passed during troubled times. First, in 1912, war was declared against Turkey and ended with victory for the Italian arms after a protracted struggle. Hardly was this war over when Italy found herself plunged in the world conflict, from which she was to emerge victorious only in 1918. But even this did not end Italy's troubles, for the post-war period was marked by social unrest and industrial depression, which rendered times particularly hard. It was not till Fascismo was firmly established in the saddle that order was restored. And even now deleterious effects of that economic collapse consequent on the war continue to make themselves felt. The great strides made by Italy in all fields of human progress therefore are all the more remarkable considering the difficult conditions with which that country has had to contend.

The King and His Power.

King Victor Emmanuel is a constitutional monarch, and he therefore has small direct influence in Italian politics. Theoretically he has power to veto any law, since no law is effective unless it bears his signature. But this power is seldom exercised. Especially is this true of Victor Emmanuel, who by nature is rather retiring and believes in allowing the constitutional machinery of the State to run its course unimpeded.

From this, however, it must not be deduced that the King has no share in Italian political life. On the contrary, his influence is strongly felt behind the scenes and he certainly is entitled to a large share of the credit for the great progress made by Italy under his reign. He once jokingly described himself as "permanent Under-Secretary to Italy's Premiers," and there is no doubt that he has performed this mission with firmness and tact, providing that continuity of government whose lack is one of the faults in the majority of Continental parliamentary régimes.

There is no evidence that Victor Emmanuel played a prominent part in getting Italy into war against the Central Empires. As is known, Italy was bound by treaty alliance with Germany and Austria; and the King felt he must make no move toward joining the other side unless the sentiments of his country were overwhelmingly in favor of that course. In fact, the Italians were almost unanimous and through their representatives in Parliament demanded a declaration of war against the Central Empires; and the King didn't refuse his consent.

During the war Victor Emmanuel's rôle was equal to that of any of the other kings. He left for the front with his first troops and did not leave the scene of action until the armistice was declared. He and King Albert of the Belgians, to whom his family is now related by marriage, were true fighting kings of Europe.

Civil War Avoided.

Only once did Victor Emmanuel defy his ministers on an important question. That was in October, 1922, when he refused to sign a decree declaring martial law in order to check the advance on Rome of Mussolini's Fascist legions. The Cabinet had already prepared the decree, so sure was it that the King would sign it, and had even had martial law declared. But the King refused to plunge his country into civil war. Instead, he instructed his aide to get Mussolini on the telephone in Milan and invite him to come to Rome to become head of the government. By so doing he added another reason for the gratitude of the Italian people.

The King showed a considerable degree of courage and proved that he set the interests of the nation far above his own personal interests. Fascismo at that time, according to Mussolini's own phrase, was "tendentially republican," but Victor Emmanuel evidently thought it was worth even risking his throne for the sake of avoiding bloody civil war which would undoubtedly have followed any attempt on his part actively to resist the Fascist revolution. His course also proved him a keen judge of character, for Mussolini's first act on reaching Rome was to bow at the feet of the King and assure him that the Fascist legions were at the disposal of the House of Savoy.

Once Fascismo had embraced the cause of monarchy, it never showed any disposition to depart from it. Mussolini never overlooks any occasion publicly to announce his devotion to the King and to declare that monarchy is one of the pillars on which the Fascist régime rests. The King on his part after standing against his Ministers in the matter of the declaration of martial law, again retired into the shade and resumed his functions as a constitutional sovereign. He lives most of his time on one or other of his estates, from which, however, he closely watches affairs of State. Every time he comes to Rome he has long conferences with Mussolini, in which the most important national problems are discussed. It is certain by this means that his moderating influence is felt, though he himself never figures personally.

There frequently have been rumors of supposed conflict between Mussolini and the monarchy, but there is no evidence of their truth. The King's constitutional training and habit of years renders him disinclined to interfere with his Ministers except by giving advice. If he some day were to become convinced that the majority of the Italian people were dissatisfied with the Fascist régime, then he would have to face the problem of what to do. Unless such an occasion arises, he believes the best policy is to let events follow their natural course. He is content with Mussolini's régime so long as the Italian people are content with it.

The King is now approaching sixty-one. He is still strong and vigorous, and the Italian people look forward to many more years of his gentle and enlightened leadership.

LONDON'S SOCIETY OFF FOR GOODWOOD

Race Meet in Sussex, Opening Tuesday, Will Herald End of the Social Season.

By HAYDEN CHURCH.

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, July 19.—Glorious Goodwood—it would be heresy to write the name of Goodwood without the exuberant adjective that more than a century and a quarter of tradition has wedded to it—opens on Tuesday.

"London society's annual picnic on its way to the sea," Goodwood has been called. Actually it is one of the three classic race meets that in England are outstanding social events, the other two being the Derby and Ascot.

But at Goodwood the butterflies of Mayfair, male and female alike, are less concerned with racing and even with dress than with disporting themselves amid the natural beauties and in the care-free atmosphere of perhaps the loveliest of England's pleasure grounds.

This pleasure ground—probably the most attractively situated race course in the world—forms part of a lordly ducal estate, high up on the rolling West Sussex Downs, about sixty miles from London and within sight of the English Channel.

The opening of Goodwood Week next Tuesday will represent the rise of the curtain on the last act of the London season. The act is in two scenes, Goodwood and Cowes. And then the players, the sprightly Mayfairites, tired of late nights and indoor functions and the serious business of what to wear next, go to the seaside, the Alps, the south of France and the Scottish grouse moors, there to recuperate their spent energies.

Goodwood is unique among English race meets in a number of ways, the chief one being the fact that it is the private enterprise of a duke, of a duke, moreover, through whose veins courses royal blood and who is alone in the peerage in being a duke three times over—his grace of Richmond, Gordon and Lennox.

It is of his demesne, Goodwood Park, that the classic race course forms part, and a ravishingly lovely estate it is. Perched on a crest of the Downs and surrounded by beech and pine woods, the property commands one of the most bewitching stretches of plain, river and sea in the world, with the turrets and bastions of ancient Arundel Castle and, on a clear day, the Isle of Wight, in the background.

The great day is Thursday, when the famous Goodwood Cup is raced for. Then, with the King and Queen in the Duke's private stand, and the near-by Trundle Hill studded with the polished roofs of hundreds of limousines glittering in the sunshine and the clubs luncheon tents to set it all off, the scene is one to linger long in the memory.

All sorts of devices, including carrier pigeons, have been utilized by newspaper men in years past in the endeavor to be first with flashes giving the results of races, and even messages for royalty have had to be telegraphed or telephoned to Chichester and then conveyed to Goodwood by road.

FRANCE CELEBRATES CENTENARY OF FLAG

Tricolor Has Survived Many National Changes Since Adoption in 1830.

By LANSING WARREN.

Special Correspondence, THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, July 17.—France this year is celebrating the one-hundredth anniversary of her flag. At every excuse the Tricolor unfurls from the balconies and clusters over the shop fronts, whether to wave in the national holiday or to flap a welcome to a visiting delegation or convention of Americans. On July 14 all the historic and most glorious banners of the past were paraded and for weeks the downtown streets have been fluttering with flags.

The real anniversary, however, is on July 29, the day that Louis Philippe, at the behest of Lafayette, accepted the colors of the Revolution after the coup d'état of 1830. The red, white and blue, of course, had much deeper roots in the national consciousness than that, but not until the rule of Napoleon did it become official.

The French Tricolor legend is less definite than ours. Their Betsy Ross, if there ever was one, is anonymous, and her part could only be played by Marianne.

Before the revolution France never had a really national flag. The white flag—the flag of the Kings—was introduced by Henry of Navarre, but at that time it was merely a rallying point for troops. Generals had their flags, and each regiment had its flag, and these emblems were of many colors. The red, white and blue was a favorite among them, and was used in many designs. Some say it was brought into France with the Roman legions. It was seen with Charles Martel when he beat back the Moors, and it reappeared constantly at critical moments in French history. But the white flag led the armies when the King was with them.

Flag Becomes Symbol.

The real birth of the Tricolor was at the storming of the Bastile. It was then it became a popular symbol. How it made its appearance is not precisely known, and it may be that the red, white and blue of the American flag of independence had made its impression and was not altogether without influence in the decision of the Paris mob to use it as their banner.

Under Napoleon's rule in 1812 the flag was formally adopted. The colors were disposed in accordance with heraldry, which prescribes that colors shall be separated by a metal, and the white, representing silver, was placed between the red and the blue.

With Napoleon's downfall the Tricolor was suppressed by the returning royalty. Under Louis XVIII and his brother, Charles X, the wearing of the Tricolor cockade became a dangerous act and punishable by law. The Tricolor flags completely disappeared from view, but not from memory, for on the day of victory in the sharp revolution of 1830 the mob went into ecstacies of joy at the sight of it.

A GULLIVER LOOKS AT OUR SCHOOLS

Dr. George S. Counts Criticizes Their Lack of Social Vision

THE AMERICAN ROAD TO CULTURE. A Social Interpretation of Education in the United States. By George S. Counts. 194 pp. New York: The John Day Company. $2.50.

BY EUNICE FULLER BARNARD

AMERICAN education, all dressed up in the modish garb of million-dollar school buildings, platoon plans and intelligence tests, has nevertheless — to translate Dr. Counts's opinion into the vernacular — no place to go. Like the American life it reflects, in the midst of its glittering mechanical efficiency it has no social objective.

Caught between the old agrarian and the new industrial order, it is rapidly losing the ideals of the one while it has failed to evolve a philosophy suited to the other. Until the leaders of educational thought go beyond the present gathering of statistics to think through the educational and social implications of the machine culture, our school system will continue, he believes, to serve the hybrid gods of practical utility and individual success.

After the dispassionate fashion of a modern Gulliver, Dr. Counts has set himself the task of objectively appraising the inner meaning of our Brobdingnagian educational scene through its outward manifestations. Born in Kansas, and now a Professor of Education at Teachers College, he has discussed his profession and his countrymen in the third person, keeping to his rôle of pseudo-foreign observer in letter and usually in spirit. Eschewing the writings of American educators, he has attempted to abstract entirely from observation of its practice the living essence of American educational theory. By our program and not by our protestations, in other words, he has tried to know us.

Surveying us thus from above the battle, he discerns ten principles which seem to actuate our educational conduct, and which, he believes, "should arouse but little dispute among informed persons." These principles, to each of which he devotes a chapter, range from a glorification of individual success to the seemingly antithetical emphasis on social conformity.

But somehow through and sometimes in spite of the carefully grouped, though occasionally overlapping, material one gets the panoramic sense of the author's conception of a poor, pioneering, farming people with an overweening faith in the potentialities of the individual man, gradually developing into a highly organized industrial society—of a nation of radicals becoming conservatives and educationally losing their way. Indeed, between the old order and the new he sees, perhaps, but one vital, continuously developing belief—that in life as a competition between individuals.

From the beginning one chief function of our vaunted free school system has been to see that the terms of the competition, educationally speaking, were made approximately equal for all. For environment, in the traditional American view, and not heredity, is the determining factor in life. Thus, in establishing universal education, they were, to the general mind, providing one major means by which every man might escape from poverty, social oblivion and manual labor. "For," says the author:

> It is an interesting fact that the people of the United States, while constantly speaking of the dignity of labor and professing to view all forms of labor as equally worthy, seek to escape from its manual varieties as rapidly and completely as possible.

This spirit of individual competition the school, in Dr. Counts's view, has increasingly fostered. The whole system of marks, credits and degrees, even such modern innovations as the Dalton plan and the standardized tests and measurement devices, are but extreme expressions of the general tendency in American education "to encourage the individual to regard his own interest, as opposed to that of his fellows." For, according to the American assumption, as Dr. Counts interprets it, human nature being what it is, "high accomplishment in any field must spring from the egoistic rather than the social impulses."

Dr. George S. Counts.

From the beginning the American school has thus done more perhaps to encourage the idea of life as a race than, as originally intended, to make its terms fair. In spite of the semblance of equal educational opportunity the principle of local school support has operated to give the advantage to the rich, urban community, while rural schools in general and indeed the systems of certain entire States are "poorly equipped, poorly taught and poorly led." For, says the author, much, it must be admitted after the detached manner of Dr. Jonathan Swift:

> Their [the American] entire system of education from top to bottom, with its emphasis on decentralization and local initiative, is defended on the more grounds that it prevents the universal adoption of any single practice, theory of education or system of thought and brings them all into free competition.

Meanwhile, as the conditions of American life began to change and the business man more and more supplanted the farmer in the control of education as in other matters, the school, especially the secondary school and the college, began to respond by showing an increasing practical utility. Greek began to lose its grip and the high school became receptive to almost any vocational subject. Scientific management and other terms of big business came into school administration, but the essential social aims of the whole process remained untouched.

Today such social ends as the Americans visualize in their school system are the left-overs from an old and now almost alien civilization. There is, to be sure, a kind of national solidarity arising from compulsory education and there is the specific teaching of patriotism, which in Dr. Counts's view, consists mainly of "a knowledge of the Federal Constitution, an unenlightened veneration for the founders of the Republic and a willingness to die for one's country," but lacks the urge which "opportunity to engage in large creative undertakings" in peacetime might provide.

Beyond this, a certain general social conformity is inherent in the work of the school. For, while in the realm of mechanical improvements and practical affairs the modern Americans surpass all other peoples in their readiness to adopt new devices, yet in the wide areas of politics, economics, morals and religion the author believes they tend to view searching inquiry as fraught with great danger. Thus, under the present control of education by the business man > a textbook must not offend the Daughters of the American Revolution, the Knights of Columbus, the English-Speaking Union, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Federation of Labor, the Grand Army of the Republic, the Order of the Confederate Veterans, the American Legion and the Ku Klux Klan.

And the teacher must resemble the textbook.

In recounting the dying out of social vision in the American school, both Dr. Counts's facts and his manner of impartial observer are exceedingly effective. What the remedy is that he proposes is not quite so clear. He repudiates the present statistical and scientific surveys as being too static a measure in our daily changing civilization. But whether the philosophic approach, the "thinking through," which he advocates, could leap by a miracle of insight where science cannot crawl may be questioned. Meanwhile, for an honest, courageous and sometimes subtle account of their present educational dilemma Americans are in his debt.

The book is dedicated to John Dewey, who has interested himself in bringing about education of the sort Dr. Counts desires.

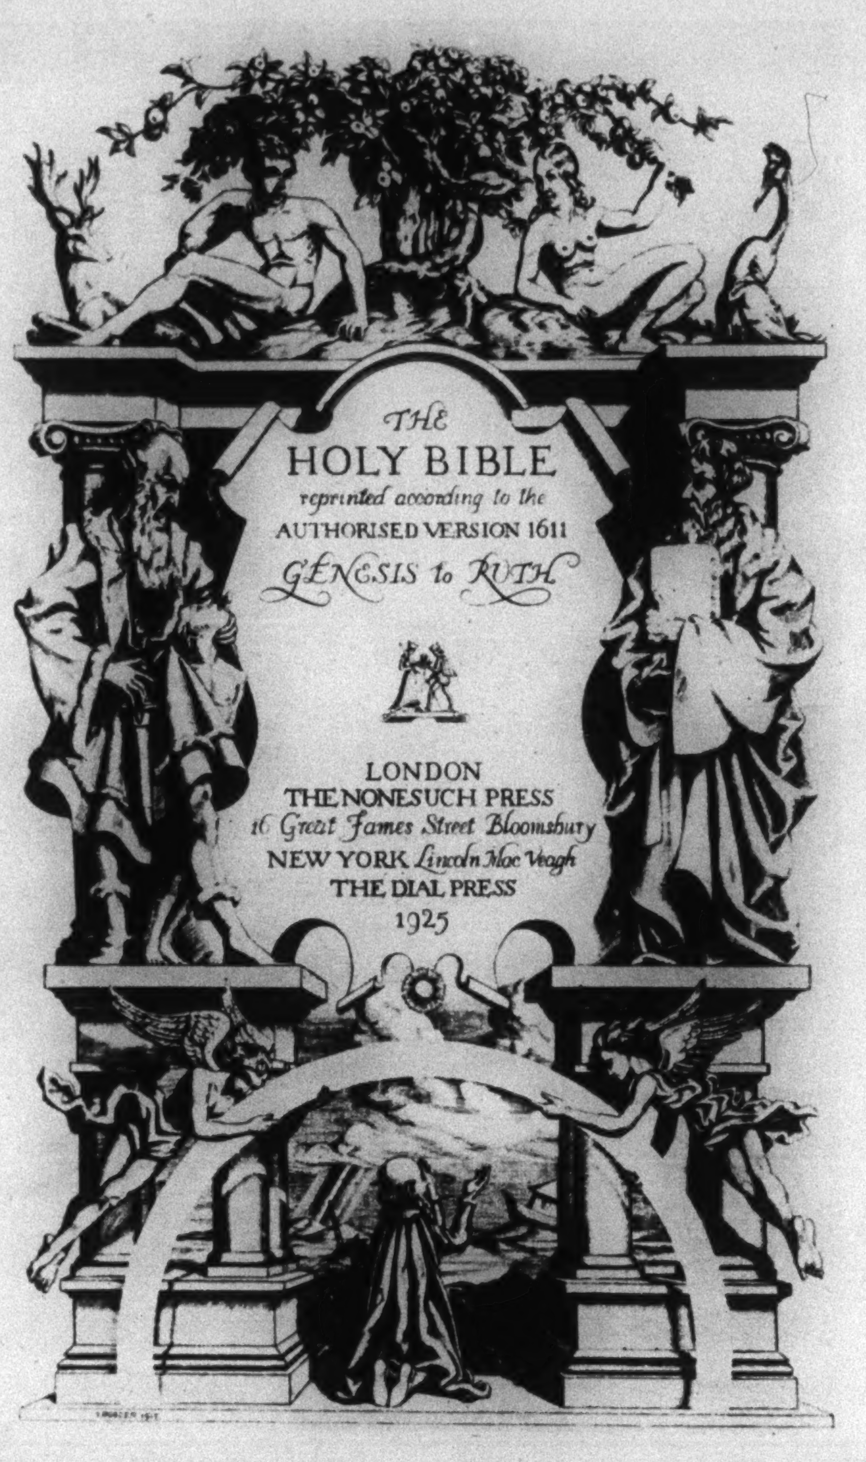
DOUBLEDAY - DORAN

Varied Fare in the Second Issue of The Colophon

A High Level of Excellence Is Maintained in the New Quarterly for Book Collectors



Engraving by Stephen Gooden for the Nonesuch Bible.

THE COLOPHON: A Book Collectors' Quarterly. Part Two. 90 pp. New York: The Colophon, Ltd. Yearly subscription $10.

By PHILIP BROOKS

THE most agreeable thing that has happened to book collecting in America is the publication of this fine-spirited periodical. Unique in many respects, it has already become an international institution. And it is well that it should so quickly have attained recognition. Collectors have for many years been bullied and hoodwinked into reading third-rate drivel prepared for their edification by second-rate minds. Here they have been trapped, I suspect a good many them, into subscribing for something for which they had not bargained, something for the most part beyond their expectation. These comely quarto volumes show a refreshing disposition to treat their readers to something better than those, oh, so tiresome, discussions of points and prices. Their dominant flavor is literary and artistic.

Having overcome our initial diffidence in approaching a magazine bound like a book, with the articles printed piecemeal in various parts of the world and gathered together without pagination, a magazine, of all things, guiltless of advertisements, we may proceed at once to an examination of its contents. Despite its unusual beauty of form, as time goes by it is by its substance that The Colophon must stand or fall. After reading the first two numbers we are glad to report the attractive edifice still standing. In the opinion of this reviewer four of the eight essays in the present number are decidedly worth doing, two are below the level The Colophon ought to maintain, and two are hardly worthy of the good paper and ink expended upon them. The remaining two contributions are illustrations, and we like them.

The comparison between the first two members seems almost inevitable. We could say that we like this one better. We could say that we like it less. We shall say neither, and thereby eschew a field of discussion that can only prove unprofitable. There is plenty of room in each volume for a healthy variety of opinion. In the matter of illustrations the present number is richer by far than its predecessor, but that is due entirely to James Laver's article on the incomparable Stephen Gooden, one of the best in the book. It is a joy to study these plates. They have a rare charm and loveliness that make them an unending source of delight, from the exquisite beauty of the figures illustrating Cowley's "Anacreon" to the delicate imagery of the plates for the "Brook Kerith" or the forthcoming edition of La Fontaine.

Among the essays themselves first prize is easily awarded to John T. Winterich's fresh and lively characterization of Bloodgood Haviland Cutter, the Larriat of Mark Twain's "Innocents Abroad." This irrepressible versifier, who in 1886 published a bulky volume of the worst doggerel we recall having seen, was a "humorous" poet who had no sense of humor whatever. Mr. Winterich pillories his subject in gentle, kindly fashion, and resisting all temptation to exaggerate, produces a perfectly delicious satirical portrait. "Another Day," by Henry W. Kent of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, is an entirely laudable attempt to repair the injustice done to the memory of the Rev. Thomas Frognall Dibdin, the zealous and famous bibliophile of a hundred years ago. The task is not an easy one, as it has become fashionable to deride the name of Dibdin. Mr. Kent's article, which is cast in the form of a dialogue, recalls the picture of Dibdin at the height of his fame. He was the first to write of books from the point of view of their beauty; he did things in the grand manner, and he left behind him a noble array of volumes of his own writings printed and bound in all the luxury of paper, type and embellishments at his command.

The leading article in The Colophon, and its most permanent contribution to letters, is an excursion in the realm of higher criticism by Professor Carl F. Schreiber of Yale. It is called "Mr. Poe at His Conjurations Again." When an ordinary writer steals from his colleagues he is charged with plagiarism. When a man of genius is guilty of the offense, when it is Poe, for instance, his crime is "conjuration." He is accused, like the small boy, of being "up to tricks." The indictment of Poe we cannot help regarding as a regrettable exposure. It seems a pity to have disturbed his memory. We should like to argue that Professor Schreiber's evidence is after all circumstantial. But he builds up too good and secure a case for Poe's ignorance of the German language in general and of Goethe in particular. Despite the fact that he probably "never read more than three pages of consecutive German prose," he tried awfully hard to create a background of German scholarship for his work. That Poe's method was to work back from English translations to get at the "original" German there can be little doubt. Need we attempt an analysis of the method of Professor Schreiber, curator of the Goethe collection at Yale, and build up a case to show that he was roused by Poe's criticism of "Werther" to investigate Poe's knowledge and expose him? Well, hardly. For Professor Schreiber acts more like one performing a painful duty, and his article, which might have been a dull piece of exposition, is handled with delicacy and tact.

The rest of The Colophon did not excite us unduly. Hugh Walpole, who began writing at the ripe age of 6, tells of his first published work. Frederic Melcher contributes a monograph on Robert Frost and his books, to which is appended a thorough bibliography by H. S. Boutell. The account is straightforward and that is all. Finally, there are the two articles addressed directly to book collectors. "First Flights" by John C. Eckel resumes the subject of current prices, a subject that has an unfailing, sure-fire appeal. Mr. Eckel suggests the collecting of first editions of first books by eminent authors. He has a maturer touch than the ordinary glib writers on this popular theme and his figures of estimates have an authentic ring. Seymour de Ricci in "Book Collecting for All Purses" makes not a few suggestions for specialized collecting. But he does not seem very resourceful. Mr. de Ricci is too well informed in bibliographical matters to be guilty of ineptitude in recommending fields to exploit. Perhaps he is just teasing us?

Thus, with some excellent material, and a little that will be quickly forgotten, The Colophon proceeds apace. It deserves well at the hands of its subscribers. The editorial board, Elmer Adler, Burton Emmett, Vrest Orton and John T. Winterich, are certainly animated by no self-interest, and despite its oversubscription the first year, the quarterly is an unprofitable venture. A magazine of such high calibre should pay its own way. The suggestion to increase the number of subscribers to 3,000 is a move in the right direction. But why stop at 3,000? There is no important reason to make The Colophon exclusive. It is an error to suppose that a magazine boasting such varied talents and an occasional tidbit like Mr. Winterich's monograph is of interest only to the few thousands lucky enough to subscribe in time. Its appeal is to all classes of readers, even readers who cannot, or will not, collect, readers to whom vitality in a magazine and an interest in human things in the sphere of books count for something.

Father Knox Scrambles Some Reputations

ESSAYS IN SATIRE. By Ronald Knox. 287 p. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.

PEOPLE are inclined to juggle carelessly with the terms, satire, humor and irony. In order to avoid any lax confusion Ronald Knox prefaces his collection of essays with a neat and pithy discussion of the distinctions between humor and satire. Too urbane to be ponderously in earnest, he nevertheless advances the provocative suggestion that we are in danger of losing our power to take ridicule seriously, that "our habituation to humorous reading has inoculated our systems against the beneficent poison of satire."

The exclusive province of humor, says Father Knox, is man—and man seen in circumstances so unexpectedly incongruous as to detract from his human dignity. The humorist, quite frequently, laughs good-naturedly at his own follies, makes himself the butt of his own jokes. The satirist, on the other hand, is aloof from his victim and superior to him. There is malice in his laughter; his shafts are barbed and deadly. According to Father Knox satire is of all ages, whereas humor is a comparatively modern manifestation — a point which requires, and does not get, elaborate proof. "Humor without satire is, strictly speaking, a perversion. * * * It may be pretty to look at, but it is, in truth, a waste of ammunition."

As one may perhaps gather, Father Knox does not indulge in complicated dialectics. His ideas are ingenious and amusing rather than carefully reasoned. The essays which follow this opening chapter are the best proof that he understands the true nature of satire. They are suave, it is true, and lacking in venom—the author hardly belongs to the breed of Swift and Pope—but they hit the target very precisely if not with shattering force.

Since he is a priest, and a convert to Catholicism at that, it is natural that several of Father Knox's essays should have religion as their theme. The best of these, and one of the best pieces in the whole book, is a lampoon on Protestant efforts toward church unity, "Reunion All Round," which is engagingly described as "a Plea for the Inclufion within the Church of England of all Mahometans, Jews, Buddhifts, Brahmins, Papifts and Atheifts, fubmitted to the confideration of the British Public." Written in a style which parodies admirably the usual seventeenth century pamphlet or sermon, it masks sly ridicule beneath a surface of innocent gravity and is, moreover, highly entertaining. Less effective, because pointed less surely at a definite mark, is "A New Cure for Religion"—a discussion of the probable consequences attendant upon the discovery of a gland of religious emotion which can be removed at will.

Actually, however, Father Knox is even more concerned with pedantry than with religion. "Studies in the Literature of Sherlock Holmes" is a delightful sally at mole-like, dry-as-dust scholarship which is perpetually preoccupied with the unimportant. Very solemnly, and with endless citations of internal and external evidence, Father Knox points out the inconsistencies in the Holmes cycle and examines the theory that only a portion of the books are genuine products of Watson's pen.

Unfortunately, Father Knox extends this formula too far. "The Identity of the Pseudo-Bunyan," "Materials for a Boswellian Problem" and "The Authorship of 'In Memoriam'" are all in the same vein, and, though the latter satirizes very amusingly the Bacon-Shakespeare controversy, they make pretty dull reading. The trick, once learned, soon palls. The inclusion of so many essentially similar essays makes the whole book seem monotonous. Father Knox has so subtle and supple a mind, the gift of parody comes so easily to him, that it is a pity he did not attempt more variety of subject matter and satirical method.

"Golden Town Where Golden Houses Are"

F. H. B.—Requested, the author's name and the complete poem in which the following stanza occurs:

They say life is a highway, and its milestones are the years,
And now and then there's a tollgate where you pay your way with tears;
It's a rough road and a steep road, and it stretches broad and far,
But it leads at last to a golden town where golden houses are.

"Who Is the Author?"

H. H. N.—Desired, the title, name and author and approximate date of publication of a book, possibly by Conan Doyle, describing the adventures of a party of British tourists, captured and held prisoners for some time by the Arabs, and finally rescued by the British Camel Corps from Wadi Halfa. The reactions of all these people, all of different temperaments and dispositions, are particularly well described by the author, and there was one fine character, an English Nonconformist minister, who proved himself remarkably courageous, helpful and resourceful.

ANSWERS

"Fair Brussels"

MISS MARY E. BURT, Fall River, Mass.—The lines asked for by B. B., in your issue of July 13, are part of the opening stanza of "The Field of Waterloo," written by Sir Walter Scott in 1815 "for the purpose of assisting the Waterloo subscription," and dedicated to "Her Grace, the Duchess of Wellington." It consists of twenty-three stanzas and a fifty-four-line conclusion, and may be found in any edition of his collected poems. The first stanza begins:

Fair Brussels, thou art far behind,
Though lingering on the morning wind,
We yet may hear the hour
Pealed over orchard and canal.

"Philip Bourke Martson"

Miss LOUELLA D. EVERETT, Boston, Mass.—"A Christmas Vigil," wanted by A. M. S. (July 6), is on Pages 41-49 of the section, "Song-Tide," in "The Collected Poems of Philip Bourke Marston," published by Roberts Brothers, Boston, 1894. DeWolfe, Fiske & Co., 2 Park Street, Boston, had a supply of remainders of this book at 35 cents. I do not see it listed in their current catalogue of remainders, but suggest that your correspondent write to them; they may have one copy left. If A. M. S. is unable to secure the book, and would like a copy of the poem, I will send a typed one. The first lines are:

Round the vast city draws the twilight gray;
I know men say
This evening is the eve of Christmas Day;
But what has Christmas-time to do with me,
Who live a shameful life out, shamelessly?

"The Noise of Waters"

W. A. GILFRY, Philadelphia, Pa.—The enclosed poem desired by M. D. in your issue of July 6 was published complete in the request, except regarding form. It is by the Irish writer, James Joyce, and may be found in the collection entitled "Chamber Music," first edition in 1907. Another comparatively recent collection of poems by the same author is "Pomes Penyeach," first edition, 1927, published in Paris by Shakespeare & Co.

XXXV.

By James Joyce.

All day I hear the noise of waters
Making moan,
Sad as the seabird is when going
Forth alone
He hears the winds cry to the waters'
Monotone.

The gray winds, the cold winds are blowing
Where I go.
I hear the noise of many waters
Far below.
All day, all night, I hear them flowing
To and fro.

Louis Hale Neuberger, Weston, W. Va.; Mrs. A. E. MacCulloch, East Rutherford, N. J.; Carol Deschere (no address), Marjorie Hale, Minneapolis, Minn., and Elise L. Eicks, Forest Hills, N. Y., answered this request. The latter writes that the poem may be found in Louis Untermeyer's "Modern British Poetry" (Harcourt, Brace & Co., 1925.)

"Building a Man"

Miss O. JACQUELINE FARNHAM, Scranton, Pa.—Perhaps the poem requested by R. H. in your issue of July 6 on building a man is the following:

THE BUILDER.

By Glenn Ward Dresbach.

How great will be the thing that he builds?
Not quite so great as his dreams are great,
Not quite so high as his hopes are nigh;
And long he must build and wait;
But the glory is, if he builds what he can,
That all the while he is building a Man!

And what will be build as the years go by,
With stone or steel or the might of a theme?
No mansion, we know, can he ever build
Out of a cottage dream.
But the glory is, if he builds at all,
That his soul can look o'er the highest wall."

Florence Hamilton, West New Brighton, N. Y., sent this poem in answer to R. H.'s query:

MAN MAKING.

By Edwin Markham.

We all are blind until we see
That in the human plan
Nothing is worth the making if
It does not make the man.

Why build these cities glorious
If man unbuilded goes?
In vain we build the world, unless
The builder also grows.

Mrs. Sarah M. Searing, Auburn, N. Y., sends the poem "The Builders," by Henry W. Longfellow. Joseph A. Fleming, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and Miss Carrie E. Nichols, New Brighton, Conn., sent Mr. Markham's poem.

"The Dead Cleopatra"

CAROLINE LEWIS LOVETT, Philadelphia, Pa.—In your issue of June 29, C. M. B. desired the enclosed poem, which may be found in Conrad Aiken's "Selected Poems." The lines wanted by your correspondent occur in the second stanza, third line.

Miss Eleanor Alletta Chaffee, Ridgewood, N. J., also sent the poem and tells us the title is "Discordants."

DISCORDANTS.

By Conrad Aiken.

Dead Cleopatra lies in a crystal casket,
Wrapped and spiced by the cunningest of hands.
Around her neck they have put a golden necklace,
Her tatbebs, it is said, are worn with sands.

Dead Cleopatra was once revered in Egypt,
Warm-eyed she was, this princess of the South.
Now she is very old and dry and faded,
With black bitumen they have sealed up her mouth.

O sweet clean earth, from whom the green blade cometh!
When we are dead, my best beloved and I,
Close well above us, that we may rest forever,
Sending up grass and blossoms to the sky.

"Fra Ugo Bassi"

Miss KATHERINE E. HEATON, Ashley Falls, Mass.—The "Sermon in a Hospital," requested by H. O. B. in your issue of July 13, was written by Harriet Eleanor Hamilton King, and published as a booklet by James Pott & Co., 214 East Twenty-third Street, New York, in "Loving Service Series." Mrs. Sallie I. Hawthorne, New Canaan, Conn., adds that it may also be obtained from Edwin S. Gorham, Inc., 18 West Forty-fifth Street, New York. Miss Laura Douglas Dock, Fayetteville, Pa., informs us: "The preface tells that it is an actual sermon, preached by Fra Ugo Bassi, a priest of the Order of St. Barnabas, who later joined the forces of Garibaldi and both preached and fought under him."

Miss Louella D. Everett, Boston, Mass., writes: "Now I heard Fra Ugo Bassi preach," the line quoted by H. O. B., is at the beginning of the third poem, "The Sermon in the Hospital," in "The Disciples," by Harriet Eleanor Hamilton King, who was born in Edinburgh, Feb. 10, 1840, and died in London in 1920. "Ugo Bassi" is a historical narrative introduced into "The Disciples," which is about the followers of Mazzini and Italy's struggle for freedom. It was published in 1878. H. O. B. will find "The Sermon in the Hospital," together with an interesting sketch of Mrs. King's life and work in "Poets and Poetry of the Nineteenth Century," edited by Alfred H. Miles, obtainable from E. P. Dutton Company, New York." She sends a copy of the poem, which begins:

Now I heard
Ugo Bassi preach. For though in Rome
He held no public ministry this year,
On Sundays in the hospital he took
His turn in preaching.

A number of other readers answered this query.

"Giving Your Heart to a Dog"

PAUL SCARBOROUGH, Franklin, Va.—Answering G. C. in your issue of July 6, the lines "Brothers and sisters, I bid you beware of giving your heart to a dog to tear," may be found in the first stanza of Rudyard Kipling's poem entitled "The Power of the Dog," included in any edition of his poetical works. The first line of the poem is: "There is sorrow enough in the natural way from men and women to fill our day." A number of readers answered this request, some of whom sent the poem.

"The Carriage Waits Without"

Miss MARY GRIFFITH, Bay City, Mich.—I am enclosing a copy of "The Carriage Waits Without," requested by H. B. L. in your issue of July 6. The poem appeared in The Harvard Lampoon. It consists of twenty lines and begins:

"The carriage waits without, my Lord."
"Without what, gentle sir?"
"Without the left-hand running-board,
Without the French chauffeur."

D. A. C., Melbourne, Fla., also answered this query.

"At the Crossroads"

Mrs. C. W. SCOTT, Elizabeth, N. J.—In your issue of July 13 R. H. asks for the poem "At the Crossroads." This poem has five stanzas and appeared in the Union Signal of April 7, 1928, in connection with an article by Richard J. Hopkins, Justice of the Kansas Supreme Court, who stated that it was a reprint from the Central Christian Advocate of March 1, 1928. It begins:

He came to the crossroads all alone,
With the sunrise on his face;
He had no fear for the path unknown,
He was set for an ambitious race.

"In Galilee Beside the Master"

Miss ALTHEA BROWNE, New York City—The enclosed poem of four stanzas, requested by J. F. C. in your issue of July 13, is entitled "My Heart's in Galilee," and the author is T. C. Harbaugh. The first stanza is as follows:

The day is ending; faster, faster,
The dark comes on o'er land and sea;
I close the Book, but still beside the Master
I walk through Galilee.

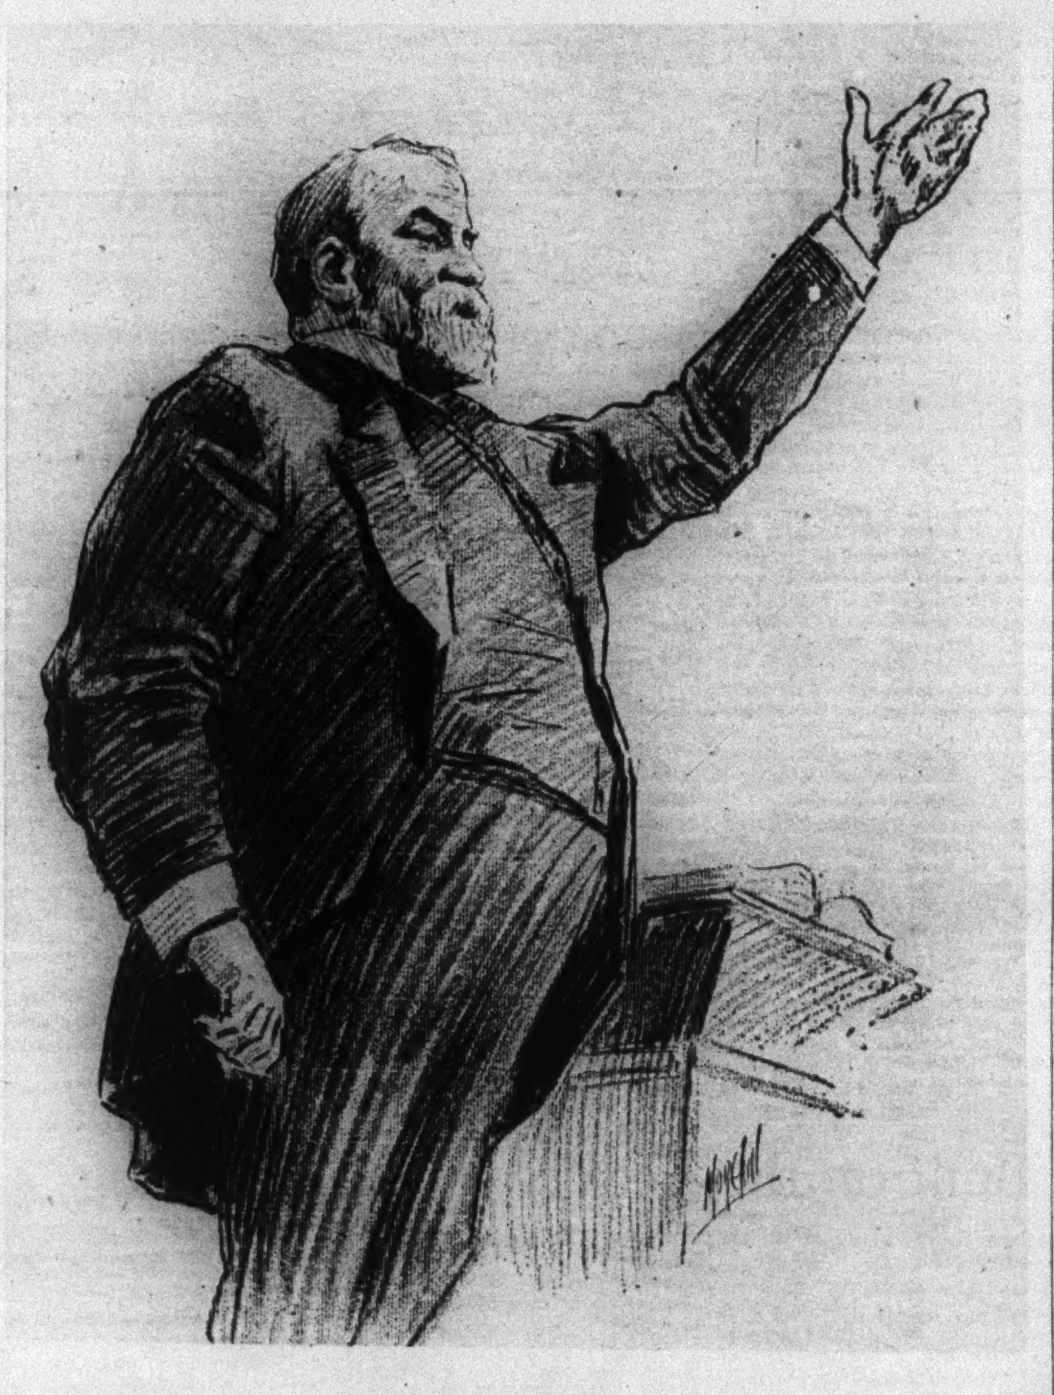
A Great Evangelist Seen Through the Eyes of His Son

Dwight L. Moody Seems to Have Escaped the Oblivion That Has Enveloped Many of His Contemporaries



Dwight L. Moody.

Cartoon in Chicago Tribune in 1898.

D. L. MOODY. By W. R. Moody. With illustrations. 555 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $3.50.

By P. W. WILSON

A YEAR after Moody's death his elder son produced a biography which has been since that day among the best sellers. With its hundred illustrations, its simple and enthusiastic narrative of events, its wealth of anecdote and quotation, this book, though hastily compiled, will continue to be, we think, popular with the public and indispensable to the student. It is human. It is readable. It is sincere.

We are glad that Mr. Will Moody should have returned to his theme. He gives us no mere revision of the earlier life. On the contrary, he has changed his manner, his matter and his publisher. The man on the canvas is the same man. The facts include the same facts. The faith is the same faith. But what connoisseurs would have appraised as a primitive by Giotto has developed into the analytical, comprehensive portraiture of the Renaissance. Moody is no longer the prisoner of evangelicalism. To the full height and breadth of his stature he confronts mankind.

It is said that if the fame of a man survives the twenty years immediately following his death that fame is secure for all time. What may be called the infant immortality of Dwight L. Moody has been tested, not by years alone, but by the upheavals of war and of revolutions, affecting sovereignties, sciences and faith itself. Amid the hurly-burly few even of the most eminent of Moody's contemporaries have escaped oblivion.

Against Moody, the dice were heavily loaded. As long as he was alive he overcame the world around him. But since his death there has arisen a generation to judge him which, according to his standard of piety, of prayer, of discipline, consists of critics, skeptics, cynics and worldlings, nor is Moody here to speak, as only he could speak, for his cause. All the more astonishing is it that this new generation—so eager for prophets, true or false, provided that they be the latest prophets—should stand bareheaded and admit that, despite all debunking, Moody is a man who will never be forgotten.

The very fiber of Moody's mind was modesty. Talking with him, you would not know that the man he was really existed. If he was photographed, it was only as a reluctant concession to his family, and his extreme care in dress was due merely to a dread lest his physique, big, burly and muscular, should seem to be so obtrusive as to detract attention from his message. To Moody there was nothing of the tactical in this attitude. As an accredited ambassador, he held that all prestige should be reserved strictly for his sovereign. But an evangelist whose most powerful appeal was entitled "Sowing and Reaping" knew well that humility, like every virtue, brings its own reward. Because he declined to be written about, therefore he has not been overwritten. We have the characterization by Gamaliel Bradford. We have the appreciation by Dr. Charles R. Erdman. There are one or two other volumes. But in the five-foot shelf to which greatness is entitled there is still plenty of room.

To explain the fascination of Moody is not easy. An inventor is remembered by his inventions, a discoverer by his discoveries, a writer by his books. But Moody invented nothing, discovered nothing, and as a writer did not pretend to distinction. His only visible achievement is Northfield, and with schools, camps and conferences, this achievement is notable. But the fact that Moody handed over to Northfield the immense revenues which came to him, mainly unsought, from his missions and publications, however creditable it may be to his rectitude, leaves to us the question why, in the first instance, he had those revenues to give away. The institutional in Moody was not a cause; it was an effect. It leads us back to the personal.

Of Moody, as of other evangelists, it has been said by the irreverent that, like Caruso, like Henry Irving, he was, in his own line, a great artist, and that for religious as for secular dramatics, a sensation-loving public is ever ready to pay at the box office.

But the theory fails to meet the case. Of all kinds of fame none is so ephemeral as the fame of a performer. Judged by sheer genius, Rachmaninoff, like Rubinstein, is greater in his playing than in his composing. Yet a hundred years hence it will not be by their playing that either of these master musicians will be known to posterity. A prelude, a romance—these will be the passports to remembrance—not the rendering of music but the music that every one can render for himself.

If we had phonographic records of Moody's addresses, it is an open question whether, moved by curiosity, we would understand the influence that he exerted. Himself, he regarded his oratory, if oratory it was, merely as a means to an end. He had no use for Cicero of whose eloquence people would say, "What a magnificent address!" His exemplar was Demosthenes who left the audience shouting, "Let us go and fight Philip." Unless he had moved men and women to go and fight Philip, Moody considered that he had failed.

A. C. Benson, author and son of the Archbishop, an Etonian and Master of Magdalene College, Cambridge, has given an astonishing account of Moody's effect on him:

> I have no recollection how he began, but he had not spoken half-a-dozen sentences before I felt as though he and I were alone in the world. The details of that speech have gone from me. After a scathing and indignant lecture on sin, he turned to drawing a picture of the hollow, drifting life, with feeble, mundane ambitions—utterly selfish, giving no service, making no sacrifice, tasting the moment, gliding feebly down the stream of time to the roaring cataract of death. Every word he said burnt into my soul. He seemed to probe the secret of my innermost heart; to be analyzing, as it were, before the Judge of the world, the arid and pitiful constituents of my most secret thought. I did not think I could have heard him out—his words fell on me like the stabs of a knife. Then he made a sudden pause, and in a pervasion of incredible dignity and pathos he drew us to the feet of the crucified Saviour, showed us the bleeding hand and dimmed eye, and the infinite heart behind.

Usually it is assumed that a man broadens when he passes from the fundamental to the liberal. With Moody, it was the other way. By birth, he inherited the Unitarian background. It was by rebirth, as he put it, that, opening a wholly unknown Bible, he became an Evangelical. In terms of antithesis, he proceeded from a broad view and what was, for him, a narrow sympathy, to a narrow view and a broad sympathy. To that shrewd theologian, T. R. Glover, the case could be put thus:

> If my doctor will cure my rheumatism, I will forgive him, saying, "The Taming of the Shrew" is as good as "As You Like It." Deplorable as that judgment seems to me, there are moments in the life of the rheumatic when he thinks of something else. If a man can show me the path of deliverance from sin, his decision that the Chronicles and the Gospels are equally inspired, is to me a thing of secondary interest. Here is such a thing as proportion in ideas, and I think Moody and Sankey put the main emphasis on the main ideas, and some good friends of mine do not.

The Unitarian in Moody was not obliterated. It was directed to a new objective. With terrific vehemence, New England had denounced slavery as a system. Moody dealt with the slavery—what Dr. Glover calls the rheumatism—of sin. For this reason, his career continues to be a challenge. It is a challenge to the sociologist who seeks redemption in environment. It is a challenge to the biologist who limits redemption by heredity. It is a challenge to those who can find no redemption except in educative processes. Moody did not deny any fact of life. He admitted the influence of environment, the force of heredity and the value of education. But he asserted that, whatever the environment, the heredity or the education, man is created the master of his ultimate, meaning his spiritual destiny.

The spell of Moody was thus strictly "gospel," the spell of good overcoming the spell of evil. With excellent candor, his son tells how, at an early period, his father escaped from the excesses of Jonathan Edwards and his oft-quoted sermon, "Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God." In Moody's own words:

> I used to preach that God was behind the sinner with a double-edged sword ready to hew him down. I preach now that God is behind him with love, and he is running away from the God of love.

Dale of Birmingham used to say that Moody was the only man he knew who "had a right to talk about hell," and this was because "he always did it with tears in his voice."

To dogma, Moody applied a saving common sense. "I am an Arminian up to the Cross," so he would say. "After the Cross, a Calvinist." He was not a Mason, but he used Masonry as an illustration:

> Suppose I want to join the Masons and seek admittance to the order. That is my part. It is the "whosoever." When I gain admittance I know I'm elected.

So with the Bible:

> He would be termed a literalist. He believed the Bible "from cover to cover." But this did not mean he was a bigot. To him many things it contained were inexplicable. These he left.

To Moody, crowds in themselves were nothing. As he interpreted his duty; there was no difference between a room with a dozen to listen and an armory where the dozen were multiplied into thousands. He was never unobservant of opportunities, and on one occasion he impressed a future President unawares. We read:

> I was in a barber's shop, sitting in a chair, when I became aware that a personality had entered the room. A man had come quietly in upon the same errand as myself and sat in the next chair to me. Every word that he uttered, though it was in not the least didactic, showed a personal and vital interest in the man who was serving him; and before I got through with what was being done to me, I was aware that I had attended an evangelistic service, because Mr. Moody was in the next chair. I purposely lingered in the room after he left, and noted the singular effect his visit had upon the barbers in that shop. They talked in undertones. They did not know his name, but they knew that somebody had elevated their thought, and I felt that I left that place as I should have left a place of worship.

That was the only occasion on which the path of Dwight L. Moody was crossed by Woodrow Wilson.

It is quite untrue that Moody left no successors. His teaching was that, by divine grace, the humblest of converts was called to be the greatest of apostles. According to the usual estimate, his conversions numbered 1,000,000. Beyond question his campaigns changed the face of Great Britain, and nowhere did Moody win more men to be crusaders for character than at Oxford, Cambridge and the other universities. Grenfell of Labrador and Kynaston Studd, Lord Mayor of London, George Adam Smith, the scholar and Henry Drummond, the most exquisite of preachers—these and 100 like them were proud to be reckoned among Moody's minute men, nor is there a country in the world where the influence, so released, has not penetrated.

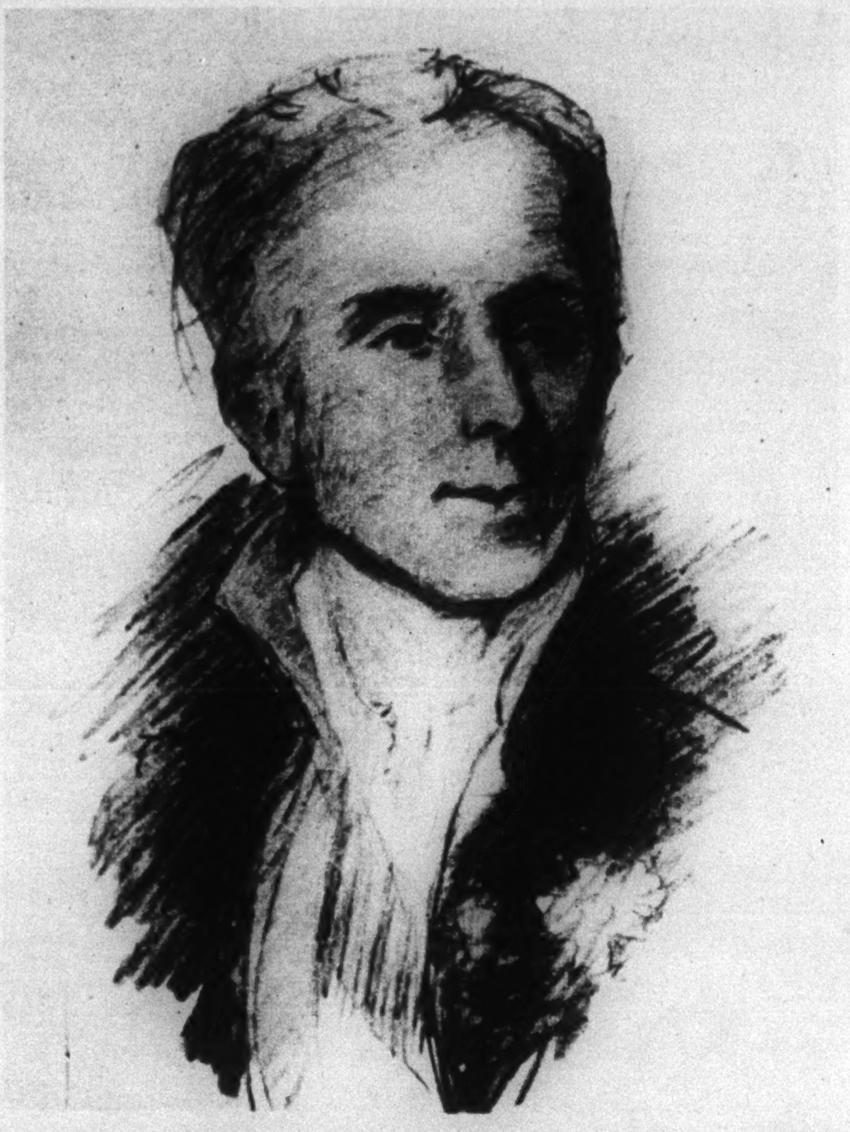
Humanizing the Watchers Of the High Heavens

Dr. Henry Smith Williams Writes a Series of Biographical Studies of the Great Astronomers



Pierre Simon Laplace (1749-1827)

Pencil Sketch Based on the Painting by Nedeou, as Transcribed by an Unknown Engraver.

THE GREAT ASTRONOMERS. By Henry Smith Williams. Illustrated by the Author. 618 pp. New York: Simon & Schuster. $6.

By CHARLES JOHNSTON

THE author of "The Great Astronomers" possesses qualities that go to the making of an excellent book. He knows his subject thoroughly, he is in love with it, he has written and lectured about it, until the whole story is at his fingers' tips. Hence a very readable book, concerned less with the abstract outline of star-lore than with the men who built it up, and with them as human beings working vigorously to widen man's thought and imagination, rather than as midnight watchers in chilly observatories.

Dr. Williams seeks to make the life of each great astronomer an interesting human story. In the sketch of Eratosthenes especially he has enriched the rather scanty outlines with imaginary conversations between the sage and his pupil, on the flat roof of the library at Alexandria. His diagrams are, like the explanations which accompany them, models of lucid accuracy. Then we are introduced to Hipparchus, Ptolemy, the Arabian astronomers, Copernicus, Tycho Brahe and the rest, up to the Herschels and Sir Norman Lockyer; all are well written and of immense interest. Thereafter, as is fitting, since we are dealing with our contemporaries, the narrative grows more abstract, a story rather of discoveries than of discoverers.

These biographies of the great astronomers are preceded by a personally conducted trip through the universe, as pictured, let us say, by Sir James Jeans; a journey among giant and dwarf stars, from blue-white to red, among galaxies, planetary and spiral nebulae. The trip is vividly described and contains a vast amount of information, well presented.

Certain philosophical statements which follow this imaginary journey among the stars are, perhaps, open to question; for example, the assertion that "only since the beginning of the nineteenth century has it been known even to the leaders of thought that time was long," our world being considered no older than 6,000 years. But take a passage from one of Buddha's discourses:

> It is as if there were a mountain consisting of a great rock a league in length, a league in width, a league in height, without break, cleft or hollow; and every hundred years a man were to come and rub it once with a silken garment; that mountain consisting of a great rock would more quickly wear away and come to an end than a world-cycle. This is the length of a world-cycle. And many such cycles have rolled by, and many hundreds of cycles, and many thousands of cycles, and many hundreds of thousands of cycles. For existence is without beginning. * * *

It would not be easy to find in the literature of modern astronomy a more eloquent and impressive description of infinite duration.

The story of Eratosthenes is followed by an account of the Greek astronomer Hipparchus (160-125 B. C.), to whom is attributed the discovery of the precession of the equinoxes—the circular swaying of the earth's axis in 25,868 years, in virtue of which the celestial pole describes a circle among the stars, with the result that in 12,000 years Vega will be the Pole Star. Here again one must enter a caveat. Seven years ago Paul Schnabel published at Leipzig a study entitled "Berossus und die Babylonisch-hellenistische Literatur." Reviewing this learned work in the "Journal of the American Oriental Society" for March 1926, Professor A. T. Olmstead writes:

> Schnabel * * * goes on to prove that Kidinnu discovered the tropic year and the precession of the Equinoxes. If this is true, and Schnabel seems to have made out his case, then to Kidinnu goes the enormous credit of the discovery. Babylonia is once more the teacher of Greece in scientific matters, Hipparchus loses his chief claim to distinction and becomes a mere copyist. * * *

If this be so, and Professor Olmstead "seems to have made out his case," then we are no longer entitled to call Hipparchus the "greatest of the star-gazers of the old era."

While the earlier sketches have their charm, just because Dr. Williams invariably gives us the very human being engaged in astronomy rather than the abstract astronomer, the book has an added value due to the precision of mathematical detail and to the presentation of sources, as, for example, the passages in which Immanuel Kant describes his cosmic and nebular theories in 1755, anticipating Laplace by about forty years. Kant's speculations are given in his own words, and they are singularly impressive and in substantial harmony with the views of the most advanced of our moderns.

Dr. Williams is especially to be congratulated on his lucid yet rigidly scientific exposition of these modern discoveries. One has in mind, for example, the story of the Cepheid variables, a strange class of stars whose light is subject to pulsations like heart beats, the number of pulsations in a given time being proportioned to the total amount of light radiated by the star, so that, if the length of pulsation of such a star be ascertained, we have a clue to its absolute brightness and therefore its distance.

Equally brilliant is the description of the Main Sequence of stars as established at Harvard and interpreted at Princeton; the passage from a vast non-luminous globe of nebular dust to the dimly glowing "red giant" star like Betelgeuse, which condenses, growing steadily hotter, until a great white globe like Sirius is formed, with a spectrum in which hydrogen and helium predominate; then the shrinking and solidification of this globe, which becomes in turn yellow, orange and once more red, but now a red dwarf instead of a red giant. There is the difficulty that the astounding companion of Sirius is a dwarf, not red but white, concerning which Dr. Williams writes well.

Some eighty years ago a French astronomer propounded a theory that if two unequal planetary bodies come too close the smaller will explode. Saturn's rings are thus supposed to consist of fragments of a satellite which inadvertently came within "Roche's limit." And on Page 518 something similar seems to have happened to our author, with results not less startling.

Taking as his text a passage from Sir James Jeans, which suggests that, in virtue of the curvature of space, light from certain distant nebulae may come to us from two directions, so that we see them twice, at opposite sides of the sky, Dr. Williams asks why we should not extend the same argument to nebulae and stars in general; why a large number of the stars we see, perhaps a very large proportion of all celestial bodies, may not be mere reflections of each other, or of themselves, seen "the long way round"; perhaps Capella is such a reflection of our sun; perhaps one Magellanic cloud is a looking-glass image of the other, and so on. Perhaps the stellar universe which the great astronomers have taken so seriously is really Alice's Wonderland seen in the parabolic mirror, which, according to hypothesis, encloses space.

Then, after a dozen pages of this new Jabberwocky, Dr. Williams is overtaken by compunction. He formally does penance by writing a highly serious glossary of astronomical terms, a list of constellations and lists of stars of the brighter classes. While he makes no formal act of recantation, we are inclined to accept his tender of reparation and amendment.

A Romance Built on the Letters of the Brownings

ANDROMEDA IN WIMPOLE STREET. The Romance of Elizabeth Barrett Browning. By Dormer Creston. 281 pp. E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.

ANDROMEDA, as every high school boy once learned and some still learn today, was that lady of Greek mythology who was chained to the rock because her mother, Cassiopeia, had boasted of her beauty. She was rescued by Perseus. Dormer Creston's Andromeda in Wimpole Street is Elizabeth Barrett, who was rescued from her monster of a father by the Perseus, Robert Browning. It is a pretty conceit. And Barrett senior was no little of a monster. Browning, however, did more than save Elizabeth from Edward—he saved her from herself, from the morbidity that was consuming her.

This has been an Elizabeth Barrett year. The author of the present book, which might be termed the biography of a soul, has concentrated much more than any of the other writers on the romance of Elizabeth and Robert. She has illuminated her pages with innumerable extracts from the letters of the two lovers, and she has gone back in biographical study only sufficiently to make clear the romance, and beyond their marriage only sufficiently to round out the narrative.

When the letters of Elizabeth Barrett and Robert Browning were given to the world some decades ago there was a mighty hue and cry. The sentimental hugged them to their bosoms, as if they constituted a precious jar of attar. The prosaic sniffed and thundered that documents so intimate and sacred should not have been published. Reading them today it seems like a forced issue. Except for their generally superior literary style, they appear not inherently different from the usual run of love-letters. But one is frankly astounded at their quantity. In this typewriter age we are prone to think we have doubled or trebled our output of words. Can it be that the keys are slower than the pen? Looking at our literary forebears, one is aghast at the amount of ink they were able to scatter—long novels, poems, letters. And whether a succession of novels or reams of poetry, always letters.

Fortunately the two did not write exclusively of their love, although it was the force behind every letter. In consequence, such an edited selection of the letters as Miss Creston's is a reflection of two lives built up in a highly dramatic manner, albeit, a dramatic manner that is muted. Although in prose, it is a poetic drama, with many a lyric scattered through, as when Elizabeth writes of flowers sent her by Browning.

> Ah! my hawthorn spray! Do you know I caught myself pitying it for being gathered, with the green promise of leaves on it! There is room, too, on it for the feet of a bird! Still I shall keep it longer than it would have stayed on the hedge, that is certain!

The italics are, of course, Miss Barrett's, underscoring being part of every Victorian letter.

But Browning was not the only one to send flowers, and it might be argued that, of the two, Elizabeth's offering had more of passion behind it, since she appears to have been willing to commit the unlawful act of gathering them for him at the Botanical Gardens, where the gathering of flowers was forbidden. After a bit of pleasantry over her "felony," or "burglary" at the least, she rhapsodizes:

> What I enjoy most to see is the green under the green—where the grass stretches under trees. That is something unspeakable to me in the beauty of it. And to stand under a tree and to feel the green shadow of the tree! I never knew before the difference between the sensation of a green shadow and a brown one. I seemed to feel that green shadow through and through me, till it went out at the soles of my feet and mixed with the other green below. Is it nonsense or not?

And then there comes an unconscious touch of pathos. Elizabeth adds: "Remember that by too much use we lose the knowledge and apprehension of things and that I may feel, therefore, what you do not feel." The invalid had not been out of doors so much as had the strong man.

There is something curious in the fact that, although Elizabeth Browning was buried in Florence, Robert was not. Was it that Browning had not cherished the expectation that his remains would repose in the Abbey and so took it for granted his body would be placed beside his wife's with no specific directions necessary? Or was it that he secretly hoped for burial in the Abbey and did not wish that hope frustrated by directions of his own? Perhaps it is an unfair issue to raise. But after the pages of intensive letters it struck the reviewer with force.

"Andromeda in Wimpole Street" is excellently proportioned. The writer has selected and arranged her material with care for her main intention, namely, to put before the reader one of the great love stories of the world with every solicitude for its poetry and its beauty.

The Negro on Manhattan Island

James Weldon Johnson Tells the Story of Three Centuries of Struggle, Failure and Success, Culminating in the Harlem Movement

BLACK MANHATTAN. By James Weldon Johnson. 284 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

By JOHN CHAMBERLAIN

IT is the usual, and no doubt the normal, thing for our poets and novelists to experience a frisson of foreboding when they look out upon New York. To quote Malcolm Cowley, it is, in its physical aspects that have their psychic reverberations, a city of towers of intolerable song. But James Weldon Johnson, as poet, experiences an opposite emotion. Being a Negro, he is grateful to New York, for, excepting four riots that have resulted in disaster to the local Negro over a period of some three centuries, the city has been kind to the black man in her midst. Mr. Johnson has testified to his fondness for New York in a quite respectable sonnet; now he comes forth with a book, "Black Manhattan," which is at once history, a series of appreciations of Negro personalities, and a testimonial to a cosmopolis that makes less of dubious distinctions than do the more provincial cities of the United States.

"Black Manhattan" is put forth as the story of the Negro in New York. But it can hardly restrict itself to the strip of land between the Hudson and the East Rivers, for the New York Negro has, until quite recently, been more concerned with doings beyond the Jersey flats than he has with local troubles. In the days of Frederick Douglass and the Abolitionists, the New York Negro made primary use of New York as a fortified centre from which to direct a national campaign toward the stirring up of public opinion. The story of the Negro as pugilist from the London prize ring days of Tom Molineaux down to and beyond the pre-eminence of Jack Johnson, is national and even international. When the Negro was excelling as a jockey he was as apt to win the Kentucky Derby as the Brooklyn Handicap. Williams and Walker came out of the West to the New York stage, but they continued to revisit the playhouses of the hinterlands; and W. C. Handy, the "father of the blues," belonged to Memphis before he cast his lot with New York. The book that made the modern American Negro conscious of his destiny, DuBois's "The Souls of Black Folk," was issued from Atlanta, Ga., in 1903. Mr. Johnson is forced to tell all this, so his book amounts to an adumbration of the Negro's history in the United States. It suggests another book that will fill in the rough national outline that wavers through "Black Manhattan." Mr. Johnson is the man to do it.

The most exciting portions of "Black Manhattan" are to be found in those chapters that chart the history of the Negro as entertainer and as master of such of his own destiny as is expressed in real estate. The first is an integral portion of the history of the American stage. There have been three periods of Negro theatre history, and Mr. Johnson sketches them all, putting his emphasis on the personalities, from Billy Kersands to Paul Robeson, that have given direction to the various movements within the theatre. The initial period was that of the minstrels, which flourished immediately after the Civil War. In the ante-bellum days minstrelsy had its beginnings in the plantation adepts at the banjo and the bones—the latter being an instrument devised from the ribs of a sheep or some other animal. After the war, in that long and dismal period when, to quote Charles Chesnutt, the Northerner derived his opinion of the Negro from the "coon" song and the police report, minstrelsy made its way to popularity in the Northern cities, being nursed to its synthetic peak by white men and black alike. Mr. Johnson is not a howling patron of the minstrel show, for, as he says, "it fixed a stage tradition which has not yet been entirely broken * * * the tradition of the Negro as only an irresponsible, happy-go-lucky, wide-grinning, loud-laughing, shuffling, banjo-playing, singing, dancing sort of being." He does, however, value it as a field of training.

The second period of the Negro as entertainer grew out of the minstrel stage by a series of mutations, the first of which was embodied in "The Creole Show" of the '90s, which played in Chicago throughout the season of the World's Fair. This show had none of the features of plantation days, but it was, nevertheless, cast in a rough minstrel pattern. It led, however, to the musical comedies of Cole and Johnson and Williams and Walker, and instituted the middle theatrical period of the Negro in New York, a period that saw the Negro song writer burgeon and flourish on a plane with his white peers of what was later to become Tin Pan Alley.

The third epoch of development of the Negro in the theatre is coeval with the rise of Harlem, and the development of the Negro in other artistic fields. It is so recent that most of us know something of it from experience. Either we have seen Charles Gilpin in "The Emperor Jones," or Florence Mills in "Dixie to Broadway," or we are still trying to get tickets to "Green Pastures" to watch Richard Harrison essay his rôle of Omnicompetence that has so delighted the chorus of dramatic critics. The story of the Negro's trek northward, from his stamping grounds in Greenwich Village of the '80s, when the fashionable folk who lived about Washington Square brought a flux of black servants to the regions of Minetta Lane and Grove Street, down to his present citadel in Harlem, will be less familiar in detail to the general reader. The hegira to Harlem progressed by two stages from Greenwich Village, the first stop being made in the old tenderloin district, where a Black Bohemia flourished, cheek by jowl, with the places of lurid (though whiter) reputations that have been so raffishly celebrated by Herbert Asbury. The second halt occurred in the West Fifties, and reached its peak development in the first decade of this century. The movement to West Fifty-third Street was the result of an opportunity to get better houses than could be had downtown, and the nascence of the Harlem boom grew from the same opportunity. The inception of the Harlem development was due primarily to Philip A. Payton, a Negro in the real estate business who had more than a pocket nerve. Mr. Payton was the founder of the Afro-American Realty Company, a pioneer organization for the buying and leasing of houses to colored tenants. The organization failed, but Payton kept on fighting, and the bloodless victory won by the race in clearing a solid area in Harlem of white tenants was due more to Payton than to any one else. Today the Negro (much swelled in numbers by migration from the South that followed the passage of the Immigration act) lives, votes, owns his own property, is policed by black patrolmen, visits his own night clubs, and attends 160 colored churches, more or less at his own sweet will; and the record of his ensconcement in Harlem is free from such interludes of violence as marked the attempt of Dr. O. H. Sweet, a Negro physician, to take over a house in a white district in Detroit.

The penultimate chapter in "Black Manhattan" is devoted to a swift consideration of the Negro as novelist and poet. This subject has been treated in various essays, both by Negroes and whites, so Mr. Johnson's information should be fairly familiar. But if familiar, it is well balanced. One criticism concerns Mr. Johnson's modesty; he does not give half enough credit to his own literary accomplishments. It was his "Autobiography of an ex-Colored Man," written when he was a United States Consul in Nicaragua and published in 1912, that marked the end of a period of drouth in the Negro's cultivation of literature. The "Autobiography" was the precursor of the Harlem literature of Claude McKay, Rudolph Fisher and others. It came some nine years after "The Souls of Black Folk," and some seven years after Charles Chesnutt and Paul Laurence Dunbar had fallen silent. It was a tocsin, Johnson's first. "Black Manhattan" is a good second.

Pinning Esthetics Down to Definitions

A PRIMER OF AESTHETICS. By Louis Grudin. 247 pp. New York: Covici, Friede. $3.

THERE are at least two possibilities of approach to the theory of beauty. One can advance empirically, keeping the artist's or the appreciator's needs in view and producing something immediately practical and relevant. Or one can confine one's self to the purely theoretical standpoint, fitting one's doctrines into a given metaphysical system or deducing them from abstract premises by a carefully logical procedure. Louis Grudin's "Primer of Aesthetics" follows this last method, progressing by definition, rigidly reaching conclusions valid enough if one accepts the premises.

Much can be said in favor of this approach when one considers the airy verbalizations which too often pass for philosophy, particularly among the more esoterically inclined devotees of literature. Mr. Grudin correctly estimates the intellectual status of Wyndham Lewis, who can "vent his impatience in a storm of contempt for the philosophers—yet fall under a barrage of philosophical doctrines, exploded intuitions, hypotheses and logics." And the following paragraph disposes of the philosophical aspirations of one currently deified French literary man:

> "Philosophy," says Paul Valéry, "reduces itself to problems which depend for their solution on the ways they are written," and he proceeds to write them in the form of metaphorical images and allusions which are exasperatingly incapable of philosophical meaning. He is a distinguished exponent of the pretenders of philosophy—the host of writers whose language ranges over all the fields of culture which have contributed to the currency of literary thought, without suspecting that philosophy must differentiate these meanings and not merely follow their course. Merely to think and write about philosophical notions is not necessarily philosophy; and to enrich one's vocabulary with mathematical, psychological and physical allusions has no philosophical value in itself.

So Mr. Grudin sets out to remedy this dilettantism in "A Primer of Aesthetics," which is intended to stand on firm logical ground, to slur no proper distinctions and to include all that is relevant. The volume falls into two clear-cut sections. The first, "Three Essays in Lingual and Critical Problems," starts from the consideration of the language of philosophy, discusses Bertrand Russell's views on symbols and diverges into criticism of them. Through the resulting doctrine of symbolization, Mr. Grudin reaches a definition of poetry as a "strictly contextual relation" in which "the emphasis is neither on symbol or object [symbolized] alone" but on both as "phases of a single context." The second section is an "Introduction to a Theory of Aesthetics" handled in the same rigorously logical manner.

Throughout, Mr. Grudin's thought is well oriented and most carefully consecutive. But if one agrees with him in believing that Wyndham Lewis and Paul Valéry have fallen into the Scylla of philosophical pretension, one must also wonder whether Mr. Grudin himself has not been swept into an equally dangerous Charybdis. Is it possible to pin down the subtlety and complexity and variety of the esthetic facts into premises so cut-and-dried that our author's equally cut-and-dried, abstract conclusions follow from them with such superb precision? It seems as if Mr. Grudin had achieved an intellectual structure of crystalline lucidity, with remarkably little actual relevance to the world of experience under consideration.

A Tale of the Beginning of New England

Author of A MAN FOR THE AGES
An amazingly intimate and true-to-life picture of those gnarled days that were the beginning of New England. The author's magic touch of realism has never functioned more triumphantly. "By the Waters of Manhattan" and Other Fiction

BY THE WATERS OF MANHATTAN. By Charles Reznikoff. With an introduction by Louis Untermeyer. 255 pp. New York: Charles Boni Paper Books. 50 cents.

IN his highly laudatory introduction, Louis Untermeyer admits several things about this book; the tale which it tells is a familiar one and its people are ordinary people. This is, of course, no condemnation. There is perpetual drama in the story of those whose dreams outrun their capacities. It is not necessarily a reproach that Mr. Reznikoff's novel should remind one of countless predecessors which have also dealt with aspirations carried over from the Old World to the New. One asks, merely, how the thing has been done—whether the drama, though old, is living and significant.

The Volskys are a family of Russian Jews, self-respecting but bitterly poor. Ezekiel is obliged to move from job to job and from village to village in his effort to provide some kind of livelihood for his many children. Obviously there is no money to give Sarah Yetta, his eldest daughter, the education which she craves, nor can she be spared from the arduous household tasks. She must learn to bake and sew, to sacrifice herself for her brothers, and to assume her share of the closely knit patriarchal life of her family.

This Sarah Yetta, however, possesses a vital quality of energy. Intelligent, capable and ambitious, though not particularly imaginative, she builds up a substantial dressmaking business and is inclined to look warily at the young men whom the village matchmaker presents for her approval. Her father's death and increasing financial pressure finally stiffen her resolution to "better herself." Valiantly she sets out alone for America. There, though conditions are hard, she is befriended by other earlier emigrants from her own locality. She marries a cousin whom she has known from childhood, Saul Rubinov, and teaches him the rather profitable trade of cutting and sewing wrappers. They are more prosperous than in Russia, but Sarah Yetta still grieves for the education which she never had. "We are a lost generation," she says—in words curiously reminiscent of a different breed of expatriates. "It is for our children to do what they can."

What they can do is—little. Ezekiel, Sarah Yetta's son, has been given the education which his mother lacked. He is more sensitive and finely tempered than she, but he has not inherited her stubborn strength. To be sure, he is able to realize one of his dreams. Penniless, he manages, by getting his books and rent on credit, to establish a tiny basement bookshop in Greenwich Village. There he meets a lonely sensual girl who has animal beauty to recommend her, but who is intellectually vacuous. Although he soon comprehends that his quick imagination has idealized her, the fleshly temptation is too strong, and he struggles against it in vain. He comes to comprehend, also, that he will never escape from mediocrity, that his life will be "neither syrup nor bitters."

One can agree with Mr. Untermeyer that "By the Waters of Manhattan" is a sincere and dignified piece of work. His other claims are more dubious. He praises, for example, its "telling simplicity" which, he says, is not falsely naive, nor a mere trick of technique. True. It is not. Nevertheless one cannot wholly accept the bleakness of Mr. Reznikoff's style, with its clipped monotonous sentences. Too often one feels as if one were reading a jerky and not particularly felicitous translation.

There is, however, a more serious criticism to make. Sarah Yetta typifies excellently ambitious energy. One learns in admirable detail the circumstances of her environment and so appreciates her struggle to overcome them. In herself she is not especially interesting, nor is she very sharply individualized. Even Ezekiel, whose love affair is often quite poignant, is more a symbol of a race and class than he is a living person. He is no different from a score of other thwarted, intellectual dreamers. Mr. Reznikoff gives one an exact and vivid picture of Jewish life in old Russia. He is intelligent and sensitive. But to revitalize so old a story, to engage one's emotions actively in behalf of quite average people, he needs a keener, more discriminating sense of character than he possesses.

VASCO DA GAMA

SPICE AND THE DEVIL'S CAVE. By Agnes Danforth Hewes. 331 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

THIS novel was originally devised chiefly for juvenile consumption, but it proves in actual practice to be one of those engrossing works of historical fiction whose appeal is nearly universal. Agnes Danforth Hewes, author of "Swords on the Sea," has chosen for the background of her tale those colorful and adventurous days of maritime exploration when the European world was absorbed in the search for a sea route to India. The drama of her novel is inherent in the material. Just as it has not needed to be "written down" to the juvenile taste, so it is quite complex and stirring enough to hold the attention of the adult reader.

This story of the rivalry of the Old World for a lion's share in the New is at once a colorful history of a far-reaching commercial struggle and a vivid drama of individual hopes and aspirations. The book centres about the figure of Abel Zakuto, a great Jewish banker of Lisbon, a shrewd and wealthy trader, confident of Portugal's commercial future and anxious to insure her supremacy in the race of exploration. But quite apart from the advantages to trade, Zakuto was as eager as a boy for the glamorous adventure of the Way of the Spices. He made conjectural maps of the Orient and fashioned metal astrolabes, such as had never been known in Western Europe, and he polished with infinite pains the mahogany box of a great compass which was to guide the first crew sailing out of Lisbon for India. In Zakuto's workshop overlooking the harbor gathered other enthusiasts—Bartholomew Diaz, whose ship a few years before had rounded the Cape of Good Hope and had been forced by a mutinous crew to turn back; stocky, black-bearded Vasco da Gama, whose father before him had longed to seek out for Portugal the sea route to India; and young Ferdinand Magellan, still a page at the court of King Manoel, but already possessed of a full-blown eagerness to be off on the great adventure of discovery.

There, with Zakuto and Nicolo Conti, a young Venetian trader, the lusty mariners planned the expedition, which waited only for the King's consent, speculated impatiently upon the probable activities of Cabot or Columbus, and, gathering around the maps of the Orient, reviewed the reports of earlier explorers and argued the existence of open sea between Sofala and Aden. There one night a young Arabian girl, speechless with fright and fatigue, sought refuge from a slave ship. Zakuto and his charitable wife harbored her, and when Nejmi had learned a little Portuguese she confessed that her father had been a European trader in Aden. A chance word concerning one of her father's voyages convinced the startled company of what they had already maintained in theory, that there was in very truth a sea passage along the east coast of Africa. By means of a message from the stars, arranged by Zakuto's brother, the court astrologer, they aroused King Manoel from his political preoccupations long enough to equip an expedition, which was entrusted not to Diaz, as every one had expected, but to Vasco da Gama.

Two weary years passed without news of Gama, and he had been generally given up for lost when Nicolo Conti brought to Zakuto's workshop the news of strange rumors at the harbor—rumors which led him to believe that Venetian spies, sent overland to the East, had secretly informed themselves of Gama's arrival in India. Anticipating Gama's return and failing to make terms with Portugal for the division of commercial monopolies, Venice had set pirates off the Cape Verde Islands to waylay and destroy his battered little fleet before it reached Lisbon. How the plot was defeated and the Way of Spices saved for Portugal is the substance of an involved and more than usually swift-moving narrative. Thoroughly immersed in the spirit of her material, Mrs. Hewes has nevertheless selected such tense and revealing episodes that "Spice and the Devil's Cave," quite apart from its historical flavor, has a vivid and independent artistic life.

LINCOLN'S LAST MONTHS

THE LAST FULL MEASURE. By Honore W. Morrow. 337 pp. New York: William Morrow & Co. $2.50.

CONCLUDING the Abraham Lincoln trilogy begun with "Forever Free" and continued by "With Malice Toward None," Honoré W. Morrow's new novel, "The Last Full Measure," ends with the murder of Lincoln by John Wilkes Booth. The period is a most dramatic one, the tragedy with which it closed especially dreadful in its consequence, since Lincoln's work was far from finished. We all know that had he lived, the story of the next fifty years would have been very different, and another war would not have been needed to weld the United States into a nation. This novel opens in September, 1864, when Booth started the famous conspiracy which was to have such dire results, and carries forward, by a method of what might be called parallel narratives, the histories of the two very different men, Booth and Lincoln. The larger activities of the Secret Service of the North as well as of the South, interlocking with Booth's fanatical and often semi-lunatic schemes, are presented at considerable length. One of the most interesting sections of the book, partly because it deals with incidents comparatively unfamiliar to the general reader of today, is the account of the attempt to burn New York, of which Booth had heard, though, absorbed at the time in his scheme to kidnap Lincoln and take him to Richmond, he had given it little attention. This plot, thwarted by the efforts of the Union spy, Richard Montgomery, known as Number Seven, had for its object the destruction of a number of hotels and many public buildings, among them the theatre in which, on the very night arranged for the holocaust, Edwin Booth and his two brothers, Junius and Wilkes, were appearing in a benefit performance of "Julius Caesar." On this occasion Booth, it would seem, doubled up in the rôles of Brutus and Caesar, a peculiarly difficult feat, since one of the two was required to stab the other. Mrs. Morrow first assures us that: "Edwin would play Brutus, Junius would play Cassius and Wilkes would play Mark Antony," and a little later describes how, when the cry of "Fire!" rang through the theatre, interrupting Mark Antony's oration: "Edwin Booth, lying in Caesar's last poignant sleep, sprang to his feet" and, striding to the footlights, quelled the incipient panic.

Of course, the most important thing in the book is neither the account of the plottings nor the character of the vain, fanatical, unbalanced, hysterical Wilkes Booth, but the presentation of Lincoln. For this, Mrs. Morrow has largely relied on Lincoln's recorded speeches, on the stories he so loved to tell, and the anecdotes told about him. Full justice is done to his firm stand against the desires of Stanton, Seward, Sumner and the rest to punish the South and hang the leaders of the Confederacy, beginning with Jefferson Davis. So long, indeed, as Mrs. Morrow confines herself to fact, her picture is convincing enough, though strangely unmoving. But when she ventures to rely on her imagination, and especially when she endeavors to portray Lincoln's innermost thoughts and feelings during those last days of his life, when the shadow of the often-threatened assassination was hanging over him, she falls very far short of the greatness which was the martyred President. In the lesser matter of the conspiracy, she shows a lack of ability to bring out its dramatic aspect, to make it real and vivid to the reader, while some of the dialogue seems surprisingly stiff, and even amateurish, coming from the pen of so experienced a writer.

The book has been done with great and conscientious care. Mrs. Morrow gives a partial list of the books read, and in an "Author's Note" at the end of the volume tells us something of her method,

Notes on Rare Books

THERE is sufficient auction news around to keep ambitious dealers and collectors busy in the hottest part of the Summer. It is on Sotheby's as usual that the attention of most bookmen is focused. Just this week they held two sales of the highest importance, and while it is in the nature of anticlimax, we feel that this extended account of them should be given. Last Thursday the property of one of the great Victorians was dispersed there. It was the remaining library and manuscripts of John Ruskin, removed from his residence, Brantwood, Coniston, and sold with the consent of Arthur Severn and his trustees. The manuscripts in this interesting collection naturally made the more impressive showing, but among the books there were not a few that collectors would prize. Such, for instance, would be those early manuscripts, some of them with Ruskin's book-label, like the Greek Bible, written on 415 leaves in the fifteenth century with nine full-page miniatures painted in gold and colors and ten smaller miniatures; or the "Complainte de la Dame Pasmee contre Fortune," an early sixteenth century French manuscript on vellum with eight large miniatures; or the tenth century vellum manuscript, "Evangelistarium Graece," with many beautifully designed initials in gold and colors.

AS was to be expected, the Kate Greenaway collection from Brantwood was large, and to a great extent unique. It occupies sixty numbers of the short catalogue, and the reproductions recall the delightful, whimsical characteristics of this fine artist. It begins with a long series of autograph letters written by her to John Ruskin between 1887 and 1889, many of them containing pen-and-ink sketches and a few of them colored illustrations. Of these drawings Spielmann and Layard say some nice things, but none of them speaks more significantly than Ruskin's own half-hearted protest, when he wrote: "In trying to prevent you wasting your time on me I have never told you how much I do enjoy these little drawings. They are an immense addition to the best pleasures of my life and give me continual interest and new thought." The result of this letter was a flood of letters and drawings even greater than before. There are quite a few of the inimitable Greenaway "Almanacks," several of them presentations from the artist to Ruskin; a charming association copy, linking together intimately three important names; Browning's, "The Pied Piper of Hamelin," the first edition, inscribed "John Ruskin from Kate Greenaway, Dec. 1888"; and a quantity of original drawings by Kate Greenaway.

Just what the manuscript section of the catalogue contains there is insufficient space to do more than delineate here. First there is the considerable group of letters written by John Ruskin to his father from 1828 to 1863; long, detailed and important letters, reflecting every phase of his work and thought, bound in six quarto volumes. His holograph diaries and notebooks, occupying twenty-seven volumes, from 1835 to 1888, come next in order. Then there are the manuscripts of his early poems and juvenilia; an autograph manuscript of "The King of the Golden River," forty-three pages, which differs from the editions published in the author's lifetime; the original manuscript notebooks and material for the "Stones of Venice"; autograph manuscripts of original drafts of "Lectures on Art"; part of "Proserpina"; "Fors Clavigera"; "Turner Catalogue," 1878; the greater part of "Praeterita," and others of less importance.

Then on Friday, the 25th, at the same galleries, was sold a fine collection of Americana and early English literature, the property of a nobleman. To describe these books, tracts, pamphlets and broadsides with anything approximating their true quality, one must resort to the usual high-astounding superlatives. Some of the pieces are excessively scarce, others are in remarkably fine condition. The subjects in the main are confined to English literature and Americana of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. It fairly takes one's breath away to find in one short sale of only 146 numbers so many of these rarities in pristine state. Some of them are famous for their scarcity in any condition. But these are exceptional because they are for the most part in uncut state, as issued, with their original wrappers, and with all the impedimenta of the earliest examples off the press. To name just a few: Among the Americana, Richard Rich's "Newes from Virginia. The Lost Flocke Triumphant," the first edition, London, 1610, unbound, with the original stitching, of which rare poem only four other copies appear to be known. Two years ago at Sotheby's the Leconfield copy was sold for £6,500. "A Subpoena from the High Imperial Court of Heaven to Be Served Upon All Men," London, 1623, in the original wrappers and stitching, uncut, is an apparently unrecorded edition. The copy of Ralph Hamor's "A True Discourse of the Present Estate of Virginia," London, 1615, stitched in part of a broadside proclamation concerning Virginia, is of the first issue, with thirteen lines in the final paragraph on page 60, containing animadversions on the English clergy, for which twelve inoffensive lines were substituted in the second issue.

Rare English literature had among its representatives Chapman & Jones's "The Memorable Maske of of Court," unbound, with the original stitching, London (1613); Congreve's "The Mourning Bride," likewise unbound and with the original stitching, the first edition, 1697; Defoe's "The True-Born Englishman," in the same state, first edition, 1700; Ben Jonson's "Time Vindicated to Himself and to His Honors," original wrappers, stitched, no place, printer or date (? 1623), entirely unrecorded, there being no publication earlier than the folio of 1640 known before this; and John Sanford's "A Grammer or Introduction to the Italian Tongue," in the original wrappers, stitched, uncut, the very rare first edition, Oxford, 1605, of which the S. T. C. records only three copies.

SPACE did not permit the conclusion of our animadversions last week on William Targ's "American First Editions and Their Prices: A Checklist of the Foremost American Firsts." We were about to point out that his estimates are correct in a great many obvious prices of books that every one knows. We have no doubt that he is fairly accurate even in the vast majority of his records, but his vast majority represents minor books of second-rate authors, which are hardly collector's game. We shall not add to our list of his errors here, because any competent observer can compile one for himself. If we appear to have devoted undue space to what is, after all, a slight volume, it is because we think it necessary to sound a warning against the danger of taking it too literally. Unless it were used advisedly, with the help, say, of a reliable dealer, the book could do "inestimable" harm. It would be delightful if all life could be so easily simplified as book collecting might be through the tabulations of Mr. Targ. Delightful, too, for a none-too-scrupulous bookseller to convert such an innocent epitome as this to his own dark uses.

remarking that the notes she took, covering only the last six months of Lincoln's life, "amount to about three hundred thousand words of fact statements." Though the novel may leave something to be desired in the matter of artistry, the care and labor expended on it are undeniably admirable. EXPERIMENTS IN LOVE

SINNERS IN SUMMERTIME. By Sigurd Hoel. Translated from the Norwegian by Elizabeth Sprigge and Claude Napier. 311 pp. New York: Coward-McCann, Inc. $1.50.

THE critic, faced with the problem of estimating the value of Mr. Hoel's book, will, if he is not careful, find himself estimating the value of Norwegian morals instead, for so closely is the action of the novel dependent upon an acceptance of the Scandinavian standards in sexual relationships that the person who is not fully acquainted with these will run into difficulties. Freedom between the sexes has progressed, one has been led to understand, to lengths in Norway not dreamed of in this country. In spite of the title of the book, the author does not believe for a moment that the boys and girls who mate by the trial and error system in his story, are sinners. They are experimenters trying to work out their own salvation; they are students, living according to the freedom that they find necessary to their ideals, but, however they may be wrong and bring themselves and others to grief, they are not sinners.

The story opens with a house party, the members of which are Fredrik, the narrator; Alf, who for several years has been living with Erna, also of the party; Erik, whom all the girls adore because of his indifference; Johan, Sigrid, Randi and Astri.

> We were four men and four women, so there was naturally a risk of love affairs and their wretched train of complication. At least so our elders would have said, but we were confident that nothing like this was going to happen to us. Our fathers' ways were not our ways. We were going to admit the jealousies, the duplicities and all the other miseries which in the old days had been inseparably bound up with love.

So the party starts out, but the happy, carefree air does not long prevail, in spite of determination. A fifth girl, Evelyn, comes like a stormy petrel into the party, to cause jealousy and hard feeling among the group.

Imperceptibly, but surely, discord takes the place of contentment. Then Astri's fiancé and Jensen, a friend of his, come to the beach, and the disruption is complete. Erna, to spite Alf, takes up with Jensen, and Johan is blamed because he made love to Erna in the first place, until Evelyn took him away. Instead of Jensen and Alf fighting (which would be more logical), for reasons that are not very clear to any one, Jensen and Johan have a tremendous fistic battle in the pouring rain, after which feelings are a little relieved, but not much. Casual, easy pairings off have become intrigues; Sigrid tries to commit suicide, and the book ends with a second fight for no reason at all—which seems to clear the atmosphere, although the participants are nearly pounded to death.

Mr. Hoel has a distinctive style, vivid, though at times too jerky for comfortable reading. It is very seldom that a sentence is more than two lines long, and many are of only a few words. Told in the first person, the story is made real by the reactions of an almost nonparticipant observer who expresses the thoughts and ideals of this new generation with its knowledge of Freud and its belief that it can overcome human emotion with superhuman reason.

> You talk about bow legs (Fredrik says to Johan) but if you'd had your own trousers pressed, you wouldn't have noticed that Fearnley Jensen had bow legs.
> You sit there and put yourself intellectually above those two * * * but don't forget that if you could feel superior to them socially, you wouldn't give a thought to your intellect.
> I think you said something about lewdness * * * but if you had been a good dancer, this socially permitted form of lewdness would have suited you down to the ground.

So he analyzed his friend's ill-will, and so several other factors relevant to the general discontent may be rationalized, but the emotions remain in spite of the intellectual searchlight put upon them; and in spite of the great sexual freedom, no one seems to be the happier. Which brings one around, once more, to a discussion of morals, and not literature.

A PICARESQUE DRIFTER

YOUTH DARES ALL. Anonymous. 299 pp. New York: The Macaulay Company. $2.

HERE is a novel, published anonymously, which purports to come from the pen of a veteran author with several novels and plays already to his credit. We are further informed that one of his plays, dealing with life in the Southern mountains, has been produced by the Theatre Guild. This clue may be taken for what it is worth, since the style and substance of "Youth Dares All" furnish no indication of the author's identity. It is a satiric narrative, told in the first person, relating the picaresque adventures of a young man named Eddie Law.

Eddie is a drifter. He roams the country working at odd jobs, not always of an entirely legal nature, seeking the fortune which continues, usually through no admitted fault of his own, to elude him. He is untrained and practically uneducated, but incurably hopeful. Optimism and hypocrisy, in fact, are his two most noticeable traits.

> I was a rolling stone, penniless, jobless, and even the birds above had more of a shelter than I. God had taken care of them, but he seemed to have left me out of the reckoning altogether. . . Pshaw! Forget all that, Eddie Law! Who knew what tomorrow would bring? After all, I had nothing serious to regret. Nothing too serious, I mean. I was O. K., and not an entirely ignorant fellow. I'm the kind of fellow who believes in himself; that's the kind I am.

His hypocrisy was of a negative sort which permitted him to assign the most irreproachable moral motives to his own highly dubious actions, and to attribute his persistent ill-fortune, not to his own incompetence or peccancy, but to the deliberate malice of others. These are qualities which the author evidently feels to be typically American, for he presents his hero, with rather obvious and heavy-handed satire, as a victim of the Big American Idea.

Eddie Law, at 18, marooned by a storm in the town of Gardiner, Vt., looks with favor upon Elsie Hubbard, the 16-year-old daughter of his boarding house keeper. Under the lilac trees in the front yard, he plights with her an eternal troth, which he is to return in two years' time and claim. But first he has a fortune to make; he must return a successful man and lay the fruits of his success at her feet. So Eddie takes to the road in search of his great opportunity. The two years stretch to seven while he tries his none too industrious hand at bootlegging and mine promotion, at farming and chicken-raising. He spends a year in jail after having involved himself in a perfectly innocent but rather black-looking situation with the daughter of a choleric Pennsylvania Dutch farmer. Finally, after countless vicissitudes, he enjoys a minor success as a salesman of Long Island real estate, and sets out, cash in hand, for Gardiner, Vt. He finds his star, whose pure image has guided his wandering footsteps thus far, somewhat fallen, and, contributing a little further to her fall, he steals out the back-door of the Hubbard boarding house and proceeds on his way.

A LOST GENIUS

BROKEN GODS. By Flos Jewell Williams. 304 pp. Ottawa, Canada: The Graphic Publishers, Ltd. $2.50.

"TO thine ownself be true," might well be the subtitle to this long-drawn-out novel of genius lost. "Broken Gods" is the story of a youthful idealist who worshiped at the shrine of truth and beauty, but who, because of circumstances and a none too strong will, drifted away from those gods and returned to find them shattered. Charles Peters, whose ambition it is to become a poet of note, becomes a minister in a small town. He is submerged by the smugness and stupidity of his parish and is not strong enough to rise above it. He forgets his gods in the fear of what people will say. The author strives to tell how a spark of genius can be obliterated through weakness and environment, how "life is not a matter of expression but of adjustment."

But Charles himself, the persons who influence his life and whose lives he influences, these characters do not live. When they speak it is in stilted phrases. The author has introduced a variety of types into her novel.

John Russell Looks Deep Into the Hearts of Criminals

COPS 'N ROBBERS. By John Russell. 282 pp. New York: W. W. Norton & Co. $2.

FAR from being an unknown writer, John Russell, author of "In Dark Places" and "Far Wandering Men," can point to a numerous following. He has distinguishing characteristics. He sees into people. He is gifted with the power of merciless satire. Many of his paragraphs bite deep. Russell has a habit of roaming far afield, but in "Cops 'n Robbers" he remains obviously in America and most of the time in the city of New York. The volume is a collection of thirteen short stories, and although some of these apparently have appeared before in magazines, most, if not all, will be new to many readers.

Not before has Mr. Russell kept his attention so concentratedly on the criminal as in "Cops 'n Robbers." But as the darker regions of the human mind have always attracted him as a fertile field for the explorations of the fiction writer, no one will be surprised at his selection of themes for this book. Never is his robber a mere stage crook. And his stories of patrolmen indicate an understanding of these officers of the law which gives the tales a welcome reality. For Russell, as for the rest of us, the cop may be arrayed in blue uniform and brass buttons. But enclosed in that uniform is a human being, with about the usual mixture of virtues and faults, as Russell clearly perceives and cogently indicates. Nor is the book exclusively of the criminal and those whose duty it is to apprehend him. "The Wise Men" is one of the best newspaper stories since Richard Harding Davis's immortal "Gallagher," and "The Man Who Was Dead," with which the volume concludes, combines a moral lesson with the uncanny to a degree not often obtained by authors seeking to turn this particular trick.

It is a mark of these short stories by John Russell that the ending is seldom anticipated by the reader. Of course to give his tale a twist at the close is one of the dominant ambitions of every short story writer, but not always is the feat successfully accomplished. It is easy enough, of course, to make a story end in an unexpected manner. But merely to force unexpectedness is not to succeed but to fail. The careful builder sees to it that not only is the least anticipated dénouement not only logically prepared for, but episodically prepared for as well, although he will, so far as it is legitimate for him, divert attention from his true design to focus it elsewhere. How skillfully Russell both conceals his ending and prepares for it is shown in the opening piece, "Brandy 1812." As the author has the chance to do all his stuff in so many more stories than a reviewer can go into, it will be permissible to examine this one in some detail.

The tale begins with the fairly conventional situation of the man of wealth surprised in his library by the robber. There is the improbable but not impossible development of the robber's insisting on sampling the other's cigars and very fine brandy. The crook keeps his man covered, meanwhile. He's not to have a chance to ring for any one. Is there a butler? Oh, yes, of course, Jepson. And a dead shot. Hark! Is that a noise from somewhere?

> In the vague firelight the crook made out a curtained doorway and a faintly illuminated room beyond.

As the robber's gaze is momentarily diverted Amos Hutchins slips his hand toward a push-button on the table ledge.

> At once the room was flooded, as by explosion, with a leaping, dazzling radiance. The chandeliers burst into vivid light. Mr. Hutchins threw himself to the floor.
> "Shoot!" he roared. "Shoot, Jepson! Quick!"
> The burglar, who had been momentarily blinded by the sudden effulgence, wheeled to face the end of the room, and as his revolver spat Hutchins crashed down on his head the bronze statuette which had stood on the table.
> Amos Hutchins stopped on his way to the telephone to stoop over a motionless, outsprawled body and to pick up a shot-out automatic pistol. * * * Then he walked over to the front end of his long apartment and surveyed, between hanging curtains, the splintered wreck of a fine mirror which had been placed there to fill a doorway long disused.

John Russell.

It is not until the story has been laid aside that the reader realizes there was no Jepson—never had been any Jepson. By building Jepson up in the burglar's mind from the fear that there may be a butler, Russell has made both the burglar and the reader certain that there is one.

Admittedly "Brandy 1812" is solely a dramatic episode; it is intended to be nothing else. There is no adumbration of before or after; there is nothing beneath the hard, steely surface of the tale. In "Variations on a Theme," with two patrolman stories under the single caption, John Russell proves how much of substance he can indicate while ostensibly engaged entirely with the moment. We take the first "variation."

> A giant Negro gone mad from dope and drink has shot up the block and barricaded himself in one of the tenement rooms. Simson, who is still in the police school, and Nassmyth, the veteran (who happens also to be the former's uncle), talk over the situation. The older man has just revealed that he has been informed by the police doctor that he must apply for retirement because of the condition of his heart. "You're plumb pegged, Joe," Dr. Rarity had told him privately. There is no other preparation for the remarkable twist the story takes at the end, but looking back the reader sees the logic of it all.

Nassmyth insists he is "going in" after the madman. Simson begs him to wait for the reserves. No. If he fails to kill the Negro the reserves can finish the job; but whether he gets his man or not, if he is killed in the attempt his widow and children will receive the pension of a patrolman killed in action instead of the meager stipend of one retired for disability. Nassmyth goes in. And he finishes his man. But the black's pistol jams, and when Simson enters there is his uncle unhurt.

We cannot go through the entire scene that follows because Mr. Russell is leading on to a dénouement so remote from the imagination of any reader the preparation has to proceed slowly and at length. But the point is this: what the black had failed to do for Nassmyth, Simson must do with Nassmyth's revolver—there are two shots left.

> Simson swayed to his feet. Stumbling and shaking, he still had force enough to take up the revolver. To point it. To stoop. To hide his eyes against his sleeve. And to fire twice before he dropped the weapon and ran from the room.
> "Call a doctor, somebody! Call an ambulance! There's a patrolman shot up here! But he got the guy—he got the guy that did it!"

There are two stories very much in the O. Henry vein, "Plivit's Inspiration" and "The Heart Line." Indeed, this latter proves that Bagdad is still located on the subway despite all the efforts of the realists to raze it. However, we don't see how the author of the "Four Million" missed the episode of "Heart Line," although we grant that no single imagination can encompass everything. A story that starts as if by O. Henry's hand and then jumps off to a typically Russell close is "Violets."

But Mr. Russell shall have the stage to himself for the remainder of his pieces. We cannot for our own part see how any one can have but the highest regard for his achievement in "Cops 'n Robbers." We do not say that the stories are as unmistakably distinguished as the tales in "Limehouse Nights." But we do feel that they are outstanding in their more narrow field. Stories that can produce what the movies call a "thrill" and still maintain literary integrity do not happen every day.

trembling under which they would express the indignation of God against all sin." So from having been originally Quakers, they came to be "Shaking Quakers" and later just "Shakers." Furniture and implements as well as lifelike wax figures of this extraordinarily neat and precise band of eccentrics that included both men and women (but made no provisions for marriage) are scattered throughout the house. The Shakers were notable compounders of herbs, and excellent cooks. Their label on any article of food was a guarantee of its high quality. Also there was a tall black cabinet before which young and pretty women sat patiently awaiting a communication from the spirit world; for the Shakers were psychically gifted.

The third and last museum housed in a little old Harvard schoolhouse is dedicated to that noble race now extinct in New England—the American Indian. Sunk in the ground before the museum is a squaw-bowl discovered in Southboro. In a case in the main room is an exhibit of the consultation of King Philip and his General with the Medicine Man on Mount Wachusett. That scene in which the wizard's turtle snapped at the General was famous in Indian history. It marked the tragic end of the Indian and his race in Massachusetts. King Philip's war was declared and the whites won. Guides are provided by Miss Sears to take visitors over these three museums annually visited by thousands of persons.

INTO THE DEPTHS

NO BED OF ROSES. By O. W. 329 pp. New York: Macaulay Company. $2.

THIS is the story of a prostitute and drug addict, known only by the initials "O. W.," and taking the form of a diary kept by her over about ten years of her life. She describes her childhood, the unhappy environment created by an antagonistic stepmother and its destructive effect upon her life, her youth as the problem daughter of a respectable Middle Western family, and the successive steps in her disintegration, its inevitable progress constantly hidden from her by the illusion that she will one day have the strength to reform her life or that some happy chance may extricate her.

It is natural to look upon a book of this sort with a certain amount of reserve. The matter-of-fact way in which it is told speaks, however, in its favor, and seems to be worth something as internal evidence. The unconscious self-revelation is poignant, and there are no purple passages such as one might expect from the professional writer of "true confessions." It is far less sensational than the title and jacket might lead the reader to expect, and, whether fact or fiction, gives a tragic picture of a personality handicapped from the beginning and in unequal conflict with a world with which she is little fitted to cope, either by training or by innate stability.

THE STORY OF MUSIC

A HISTORY OF MUSIC. By Percy C. Buck. The New Library. 121 pp. New York: Jonathan Cape & Harrison Smith. 50 cents.

ASSUMING that knowledge should proceed from the known to the unknown," Mr. Buck has written this brief history of music backward, beginning with the present time. At each successive period of history new ideas have been in the air, and new conventions have developed to replace the old. Our present period in music, he says, has not yet stabilized, but is beginning to clarify.

Debussy is the chief exponent of the modern movement, whose revolutionary element has been the change in the concept of the chord. Many present-day composers are not modern in the sense that they have broken away from the old idea of harmony. One may be at once opposed to convention and attached to tradition, and the work of many composers today is rooted firmly in folk-music. Others are searching for a wholly new and undiscovered country.

Proceeding, according to his plan, backward, Mr. Buck takes up next the Romantic movement of the nineteenth century, whose keynote was Nature and whose greatest figure was Beethoven. The later eighteenth century had prepared the ground for this change from the contrapuntal age, whose outstanding figures were Handel and Bach, and in which had been crystallized the new impulses of the Renaissance. The history of the thousand years preceding had been the history of writing for the human voice. And before that time there had probably been little that a modern listener would recognize as music.

FROZEN MUSIC

ARCHITECTURE. By Christian Barman. The New Library. 128 pp. New York: Jonathan Cape & Harrison Smith. 50 cents.

WITHIN the space of this brief outline Mr. Barman condenses a number of iconoclastic ideas. He confines his survey to the architecture of Christian Europe, which for convenience he calls Atlantic architecture. Christian architecture, he says, was not in its origin classical, nor even European. Persia, to which many refugees fled from Roman persecution, was the scene of the first Christian building, and the culture which they later brought back to Europe was Asiatic.

The central idea of the church of this period was that of the "high place" or sanctuary, roofed over by a dome. St. Sophia, in Istanbul, is the outstanding example. The basilica houses, afterward used as churches in Rome, were primarily meeting houses, and later church buildings represented either a conflict or a compromise between these two ideas.

Mr. Barman has small use for the cathedrals of the Gothic school, which he says were planned to give as much space as possible to stained glass windows to provide the people with "a celestial cinema." The Renaissance led builders increasingly to secularize their style, and at last the use of castiron for building brought the engineer into architecture. He concludes with a short bibliography.

WHAT'S NEW IN PHYSICS

NEW FRONTIERS OF PHYSICS. By Paul R. Heyl. Appleton New World of Science Series. 162 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $2.

NOWHERE has the twentieth century introduced more revolutionary ideas than in the field of physics. These modern changes in theory are here summarized for the general reader. The nineteenth century recognized three fundamental concepts — matter, energy and ether. Matter was looked upon as atomic in structure and was characterized by inertia and gravitation. It was a vehicle for energy. The nature of the ether was a subject of controversy.

Recent years have brought successive theories as to the nature of the atom. According to Einstein, gravitation is not a mass property but a space property, and the latest conception of the atom seems to be that it is electric in nature and subject to fluctuation.

The conception of the structure of energy has undergone no less striking changes. Planck's quantum theory explains it in terms of multiples of fundamental units called quanta. Molecules losing energy do so by jumps of groups of quanta and not by continuous change.

The doctrine of the correlation of matter and energy Dr. Heyl considers the permanent contribution of the twentieth century to physical science. "Matter may * * * disappear as such and energy of equal quantity appear instead." Something like this was suggested by Newton in the eighteenth century. The idea may be carried further, and matter may be thought of as "distilling, so to speak, from one pole of the universe and condensing at the other through the intermediate phase of radiant energy."

No less revolutionary is the idea of thinking of space and time in terms of non-Euclidean geometry. Moreover, time may be correlated with space. Dr. Heyl concludes with an explanation of Einstein's theory of relativity.

EARLY MEDICINE

THE BEGINNINGS. EGYPT AND ASSYRIA. By Warren R. Dawson. 74 pp. New York: Paul B. Hoeber. $1.50.

MEDICINE IN THE BRITISH ISLES. By Sir D'Arcy Powers. 68 pp. New York: Paul B. Hoeber. $1.50

THE first of these two companion volumes covers the primitive ideas of disease and death which prevailed in Egypt and Assyria, the idea of the magician, the first medical books, the 'pothecary, and ancient Egyptian and Assyrian medicine. In these two countries, but especially in the former, medical science was born. "The driving motive of all the human efforts out of which the science of medicine has grown was the endeavor to prolong and protect life and to avert extinction." Medicine in Egypt was inseparable from magic or religions, but there was for a long time no special deity of medicine. Several well-known drugs used were hartshorn, castor oil, cumin, coriander. In an Egyptian papyrus of 1400 B. C. a skinned mouse was prescribed as a desperate remedy for a child's sickness. The blood of a bat as a depilatory is also mentioned in medical papyri. But the Egyptians were rated very high for their medical learning, and Homer states that they had more skill in medicine than any other race; also Cyrus sent to Egypt for a physician and Darius believed in them. The Assyrians possessed considerable medical knowledge and there is similarity between their medical texts and those of the Egyptians.

"Medicine in the British Isles" gives a conscientious summary of early conditions, medical corporations, the hospitals, medical education, nursing and the masters of British medicine, such as Harvey, Jenner, Bright and Hodgkin. Medicine seems to have become a profession after the Norman Conquest but was not taught systematically until the first quarter of the fifteenth century, when in 1518 the College of Physicians obtained a charter and was followed in 1540 by the Barber Surgeons' Company (later the College of Surgeons) and the Society of Apothecaries. This was the beginning. For many years hospitals continued as a pure charity under the protection of the Church. The "earliest existing diploma" granted in England for medical education was made out for one Robert Anson, 8th of August, 1497. The Barber Surgeons had the privilege of being highly tyrannical with their apprentices. A higher oral examination was occasionally held by them for which the successful candidate received the Great Diploma. As typical questions used in such examinations, note these: "From what are the words chirurgeon and cancer derived? Give the Latin and Greek equivalents for each?"

The cleavage in England between "physic and inner medicine" and surgery has always been wide. It is not usual even now to find a physician equally interested in both. Nursing has, as every one knows, had a long and continuous tradition in London, but a new tradition embodying a part of the old one began with Florence Nightingale.

Both these books deserve attention and give many grim and droll facts of the past.

LONDON.

ACCORDING to some authorities, the dividing line between ancient and modern history is the French Revolution; according to others, the Call of Abraham. Though the question remains unsettled, most people will agree that "the Cambridge Ancient History" is not a misnomer for a series whose eighth volume, now in the printers' hands, will deal with the struggle of Rome against Carthage. Apart from that series, the Cambridge University Press is also issuing an account of "The Bronze Age," written by Professor V. Gordon Childe for the general reader. Some other recent and forthcoming publications in the historical field will offer piquant contrasts. There will be a distinct change of atmosphere, for instance, when one turns from "The Economic Life of the Ancient World" (Paul), by Jules Toutain, to Arthur Birnie's "Economic History of Europe, 1760-1930" (Methuen), or from either of them to Dr. D. Pant's "The Commercial Policy of the Moguls" (Paul). Nor will any one who has just put down Liang Chichao's "History of Chinese Political Thought" (Paul) be able to take up Roger Soltau's "French Political Thought in the Nineteenth Century" (Benn) without noticing a difference. It will be an abrupt transition, again, from W. W. Tarn's "Hellenistic Military and Naval Developments" (Cambridge Press), a study of siege warfare and naval tactics in classical times, to such a book as "The Great War in West Africa" (Hutchinson), in which Brig. Gen. E. Howard Gorges describes the operations by which the Allies acquired Togoland and the Cameroons.

A rare family tradition of historical scholarship will be continued not only by Professor G. Macaulay Trevelyan in "England Under Queen Anne: Blenheim," but by his daughter, Mary C. Trevelyan, in her study of "William III and the Defense of Holland, 1672-4." Both books will be issued by Longmans in the Fall. The Cambridge Press announces a collection of "Selected Essays" by the late J. B. Bury, Dr. Trevelyan's immediate predecessor in the Regius Professorship, and also "A Bibliography of the Works of J. B. Bury," compiled with a memoir by Norman H. Baynes. The former volume, which has been edited by Professor Harold Temperley, will set forth the view that history is a science rather than an art. "The Reformation in Ireland Under Elizabeth" (Longmans), by Myles V. Ronan, is a careful study of a difficult period. "The Elizabethan Underworld" (Routledge) consists of a number of Tudor and early Stuart tracts and ballads reprinted in a modernized text. Elizabethan times are also the starting point for a survey of "The Legal History of Trade Unionism" (Longmans), by R. Y. Hedges and A. Winterbottom.

A Chapter in the Life of Thomas Mann

Thomas Mann.

Times Wide World Photos.

BERLIN.

THE publishing house of S. Fischer has announced, for the Fall, an interesting new book, of which it offers a sample in the June issue of its Neue Rundschau—a sample that is in itself a complete masterpiece. It is a thirty-two-page chapter of the life of Thomas Mann, our Nobel Prize winner—an extract from the autobiography whose publication is announced. Here this reserved, restrained author bares the depths of his mind and heart. Tersely he outlines the human happiness and suffering that have been his; his apparently calm account touches us to the core. We are amazed to see how much of his intimate experience is hidden in his objectively formal and unlyrical novels and stories. The concealing mask of coldness disguises little scenes of loving family life. Only lately he published a charming volume of this sort—"Mario und der Zauberer," a travel episode told with ironical humor behind which we could discern a background at which we shuddered.

To me, however, the most interesting thing in this chapter of Thomas Mann's life is not what he tells us of external events but what he says of the various stages of his creative work, of the conception of his ideas and of his highly individual manner of writing. Again and again he tries to gain courage for a new piece of work by telling himself that this time it will be a matter of no importance, easy to do and to be completed quickly. Such was his idea when he began his "Zauberberg," on which he worked for ten years, and which is filled with all the personal grief and spiritual struggles through which he went during that period. Even the humor that brightens some scenes in that book savors of the death which stalked the world during those ten years.

So much for the coming autobiography. Thomas Mann himself tells us of another book on which he is now working and which is taking him into a new field. He is writing a great mythological novel to be called "Jaakob und seine Söhne." Thomas Mann traveled through Palestine and Egypt that he might be able to portray more vividly the destiny of the people of Israel. In other words, even this profoundly introspective writer has been seized by the irresistible impulse that is driving our present-day authors to visit the most distant lands. The phenomenon is closely bound up with the spiritual future of our nation, and is the result of two conflicting elements; an active tendency toward disintegration, and a desire to unite the various symbolisms and ideas into a comprehensive and fundamental whole.

THIS twofold aspect manifests itself not only in actual occurrences, but in intellectual currents as well. We have, for example, two authors of importance, living in different cities and having no communication with each other, fascinated by the same great theme at the same time: Josef Ponten of Munich and Hans Friedrich Blunck of Hamburg. The Deutsche Verlagsanstalt of Stuttgart hails Ponten's work as the Iliad and the Odyssey of the German people. This all too pompous analogy invites contradiction and does more harm than good. Ponten is writing a series of novels under the general title "Volk auf dem Wege. Roman der deutschen Unruhe." The first part of this story of German unrest is called "Wolga Wolga," and is complete in itself. It is peculiarly timely just now, when all Germany is sympathizing with the Germans of the Volga region, whose tragic destiny had been almost forgotten heretofore. Written with forceful vigor, frequently rising to epic power, replete with colorful adventure, this book tells of the migration of German peasants to Russia at the time of Catherine the Great, and of the return of one of these Germans to the Germany of today, where he is bitterly disappointed.

WHILE the South German Ponten writes of the North, the North German Blunck has chosen as his subject life in the German settlements of tropical Central America; his "Land der Vulkane" has been brought out by E. Diederichs of Jena. Blunck has been tracing the rise of his people from the mythical period when the gods still ruled—a life-work of impressive unity and beauty. His latest volume describes the struggles and problems of the present. The German settlers are shown as wealthy plantation owners who have adopted the new land as their own. The young heir of one of the planters leaves his comfortable home, becomes mixed up in the wild political quarrels of the natives, renounces his father's plantation, and begins all over again, with a courageous German girl at his side, in a desert covered with rocks that have scarcely had time to cool since they were spewed forth by the terrible volcano.

In ancient times the self-sacrificing wife stayed at home, letting her man fare forth. Ponten believes this should be so.

But Blunck tells of the yearning of the modern German girl: to share the restlessness of her husband, to help cheerfully in the arduous labor of building up a new home.

A Guide Book to Japanese Literature

THE LITERATURE OF JAPAN. By J. Ingram Bryan, M. A., M. Litt., Ph. D. 248 pp. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

TO the average American, whose acquaintance with the lore of Japan is perhaps limited to a few translations and to the exquisite tales and legends of Lafcadio Hearn, this volume will serve as the introduction to an unexplored universe. Within the modest limits which he has set for himself, Dr. Bryan has not attempted to do more than to indicate the general nature of that universe; to suggest the position and salient features of a few peaks and ranges out of myriads, and to leave a vast extent of lesser although important territory untouched. But he has accomplished his task with commendable control of his subject-matter, and has produced a work that will not only be valuable as a guide book for the student, but will prove fascinating to the general follower of literature.

One's first impression, upon opening Dr. Bryan's volume, is one of bewilderment at the vast productivity of Japanese writers for the past fifteen hundred years—a productivity that dates back to the historic beginnings of Nippon and has continued unabated until our own day. At the present time more than 25,000 books are published in Japan each year (more than double our own figure!); and, of this multitude, only about 100 are translations from the literature of the West. But the depth and range of the interest in the printed word is indicated in other ways than by the streams of essays, novels, poems and plays that are issuing incessantly from the press; poetry, in particular, constitutes one of the moving interests of the masses; and its importance is indicated by Dr. Bryan in a telltale passage:

> From the Emperor down to the humblest subject the interest in poetry remains unabated. The Poetry Bureau at the Imperial Palace is an active and important national institution. Every year the Emperor announces themes for competitive poetic composition; and all who feel moved to compete may send examples of their verse to the Secretary of the Poetry Bureau at the end of the year. The number of poems received annually is generally above 25,000.

While Dr. Bryan has many illuminating comments to make on the Japanese language as a medium of expression and on the historical development of fiction, essays and the drama, his most interesting and revealing remarks have to do with poetry rather than with prose. The Japanese lyric—which is synonymous with Japanese poetry, since the epic appears to be unknown—is one of the most refined and curious works of art the world has ever known. In the most popular classic form, it is only thirty-one syllables in length; whereas an even shorter form has been widely and successfully adopted, and poems of more than thirty-one syllables have not met with general favor. Yet, despite limitations that strike the Western mind as rather arbitrary and artificial, Japanese poetry has shone by the very polish that comes of compression, and Dr. Bryan's comparison of many of the lyric gems to the diamond would appear to be justified. One may judge of the quality of certain of the poems from the very fact that they have enjoyed an unabated popularity throughout a thousand years; while the poet's desire for immortality would appear to have better chances of fulfillment in Japan than in most of the lands of the earth. Unfortunately, like most poetry—probably even more so than most poetry—that of Japan is difficult if not impossible to translate; hence the Western reader must regard it as a species of rare sweets locked within a jar to which he has not the key. Yet Dr. Bryan has attempted to translate many choice specimens; and while he does not claim that they retain the quality of the original, yet pieces such as the following (written by Sarumaru in the year 800) will indicate the sort of suggestiveness of effect at which they aim:

Far among the hills,
Treading through the crimson leaves,
Cries the mateless stag:
When I hear that lonely cry,
Ah, how sad the Autumn is!

Brief Reviews

UNITING EUROPE. By William E. Rappard. 299 pp. New Haven: Yale University Press. $3.

PROFESSOR RAPPARD is a member of the Permanent Mandates Commission of the League of Nations, and Swiss delegate to its Assembly. He is thus particularly well fitted to deal with his present subject, the rise of international cooperation in post-war Europe. The present volume consists of the second series of lectures delivered by him at Williamstown.

International cooperation in Europe, he finds, is both political and economic, and exists both outside and inside the framework of the League of Nations. The strongest factor in post-war Europe has been the rise of self-determination. In 1914 there were twenty-one separate political units in Europe. Today there are twenty-seven. Thirteen of the twenty-seven are republics today, as against three before the war. Russia and Germany were, before the war, "the two main columns of the temple of monarchical absolutism in Europe," and with their collapse the break-up of the empire of the Hapsburgs followed inevitably.

The Russian revolution stands apart from the rest, both in its origins and its philosophy. In the other new States American influence has been predominant, but as they had no republican traditions, "it is not surprising that, while aspiring to national resurrection as an ideal, they should not in the least have draped their dreams in republican garb." The dictatorships which have arisen in several cases Professor Rappard considers a temporary phenomenon. They arise in communities which are primarily agricultural, and will tend to disappear with the increasing urbanization of all countries.

Professor Rappard takes up in detail the growth of political cooperation outside the League of Nations by means of treaties, inter-allied commissions and other agencies. Economic cooperation has developed more slowly, due to national jealousies and the resulting tightening of tariff barriers, but he hopes that some sort of European customs union will eventually appear. He proceeds to the consideration of the work accomplished within the League of Nations, and the part played by its varying departments. Within the Council, he feels, there is danger of the development of an inner ring "whose decisions, when unanimous, are in fact, if not in legal theory, final." The Assembly, on the other hand, is becoming an important factor in educating public opinion, while the Permanent Court has come to play a consultative and advisory rather than a judicial part. On the whole the tendency of the League has been to take over more and more of the practical and administrative problems that have arisen with the increasing desire of the European powers to work together. "Created essentially as a political institution to prevent wars between nations, it has in fact become the great administrative agency for the promotion of voluntary international cooperation between them in times of peace."

THE PUGET SOUND REGION

ON PUGET SOUND. By Robert Walkinshaw. Illustrated by Jeanie Walter Walkinshaw. 294 pp. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

THE beautiful and picturesque country surrounding Puget Sound is the subject of this book, whose attractiveness is increased by accompanying sketches which have something of the quality of Japanese prints. The discovery of Puget Sound did not take place until comparatively recent times. Tradition had long held that the mythical Strait of Anian lay somewhere in this direction. English, Russian and Spanish ships had explored the coast without coming upon the Sound, and Captain Cook missed it by a hair's breadth in 1778. The first authentic record of its discovery, Mr. Walkinshaw holds, is to be found in the diary of the first white woman who visited this region, the 17-year-old wife of Captain Barkley of the Imperial Eagle. Captain Barkley's visit occurred in 1787. It was in 1792 that Captain George Vancouver discovered the island that now bears his name and the mountain to which he gave the name of his friend, Captain, later Admiral, Ranier.

Not until fifty years later was a Hudson Bay trading post established near the mouth of Sequalitchew Creek. Twelve years later Michael Simmons, a Kentuckian, brought a party north and set up a small grist mill on Budd Inlet, soon after the first settlers began to appear by way of the Oregon Trail. This was the beginning of the struggle between Great Britain and the United States for the possession of the country. The conflict never took the form of open hostility, and the land was held under a treaty of joint occupation. In the end the tide of American immigration proved overwhelming and the Hudson Bay interests were bought out by the United States Government.

Mr. Walkinshaw describes the cities which have sprung up almost within the span of a single generation, and which, for all their modernity, still retain their old-time flavor and the memory of pioneer days—Olympia, the capital city and the northern end of the Oregon Trail; Tacoma, "the lumber capital of America," and Seattle, named for an Indian chief, whose growth is due to the gold rush to the Yukon in 1897 and the consequent opening up of Alaska. Above them all rises the mountain, "Ranier, known to the Indians as Tacoma," which dominates the country as Fuji dominates Japan.

THREE UNUSUAL MUSEUMS

LOST UTOPIAS. By Harriet E. O'Brien. 62 pp. Boston: Perry Walton.

ON Prospect Hill in the Village of Harvard, Mass., stand three museums that are memorials of past Utopias—Fruitlands, Old Shaker House and the American Indian Museum, preserved through the painstaking efforts of a daughter of New England—Clara Endicott Sears. The first was, as most Alcott lovers know, the seat of the group of ascetic idealists headed by Amos Bronson Alcott who enthusiastically proposed to found here in 1843 a "New Eden" that should triumph by reason of its spiritual manna. The rooms of the old red house at Fruitlands—guarded by the two mulberry trees provided for the culture of the silkworms that were to "introduce variety into the raiment of the community"—are furnished with so many relics of the past that one can glimpse the group as though it still existed. Joseph Palmer who with Charles and William Lane, was a prominent member of this "Con-Sociate Family" brought to the house many fine pieces of Old English furniture from his home in "No Town." When plowing threatened to take the life of some of the weaker brethren he "imported a yoke together with a team of oxen," one of which was in reality a cow! Every member of the Alcott family is represented by mementos in the various rooms. Fruitlands has become the shrine of an ideal that could not combat a materialistic world.

Closely surrounded by its own queer little fence with the octagonal posts stands Shaker House, which also "sheltered an experiment in communistic life" founded by a woman—Mother Ann Lee. Having suffered persecution she with her small band of followers came to America in 1774 and arriving at the Square House, left her indelible mark upon it. Her sect was called "Shakers" because "in their worship they would sit in silent meditation for a while, when they were taken with a mighty

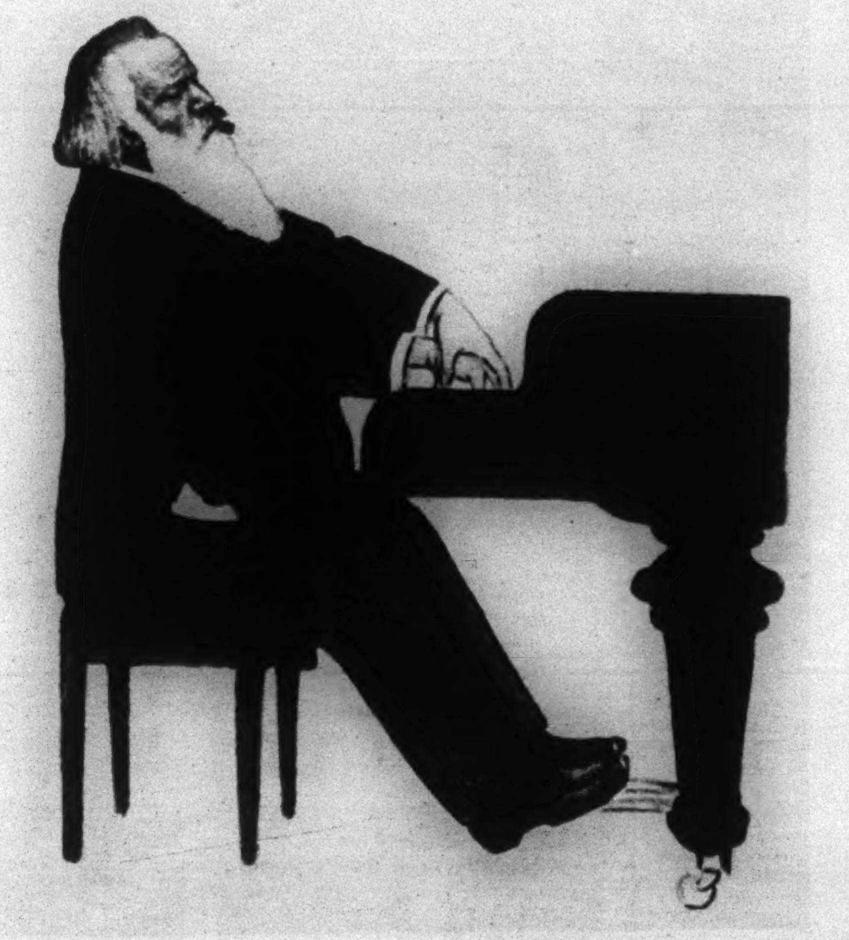
An Intimate Biography of The "Spiney" Brahms

Richard Specht Makes a New Contribution to the List of Books About the Great Composer



Johannes Brahms.

JOHANNES BRAHMS. By Richard Specht. Translated by Eric Blom. With Sixteen Illustrations. 372 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., Inc. $6.

By RICHARD ALDRICH

THE steadily growing love and appreciation of Brahms's music has been accompanied by a considerable addition to the number of biographies of the man and studies of his works. The most recent of these, Richard Specht's book, well translated from the German by Eric Blom, comes after about a dozen full-fledged biographies, nearly as many shorter volumes of reminiscences by various friends, and eighteen volumes of his correspondence. Concerning a man whose life was not marked by various and exciting outward events, this material ought to suffice. But Specht's book is a real and, it might be said, necessary addition to them. Brahms was not a man who wore his heart on his sleeve, and any daws that pecked at it were likely to get a severe drubbing and to fail in their assault. Specht knew Brahms, apparently on intimate terms, for the last ten or a dozen years of his life, and has penetrated, as far as penetration was possible, to his inner core. He is a man and a writer of sympathy and insight, and his qualities have given him as clear a view of Brahms's often crabbed, "spiney"—to use one of his own characterizations—and inaccessible personality as many of his friends could gain.

Specht's account of the man is sympathetic and full of understanding. It is somewhat more sympathetic to the man than to his music. Mr. Specht is far from being a blind worshiper, as some other Brahms biographers have felt impelled to be. In fact he makes so many reservations that he is likely to give pause to many readers of this portion of his book. For him the chamber music, the "German Requiem," a few of the other choral works and some—by no means all—of the songs are the high points in Brahms's work. Of the four symphonies which to a continually growing number today seem the pillars of his great fame, he is no unreserved admirer. And of his estimate of the other works, many readers will make many corrections of their own.

Specht makes his account of Brahms's life vivid and interesting, though it can hardly be made exciting. We see the hard and toilsome boyhood in which the study of music, fortunately fundamentally grounded, was divided with the drudgery of giving miserably paid lessons and the worse drudgery of pounding the piano for a pittance in sailors' dance halls. It was a boyhood which, he said in later years, speaking of his notorious bad manners, did not foster the cultivation of good manners. His gradual rise to success and fame is admirably and judicially recounted.

One of his earliest experiences, both as pianist and composer, was his celebrated visit to Liszt in Weimar, introduced by Joachim. False legends have been spread about this which Specht corrects, seemingly with authority. Brahms, confused and embarrassed, could not make his powers as a pianist count for what they were in playing for Liszt and his friends; Liszt played the pieces himself, deciphering Brahms's manuscripts with the marvelous power that so few have ever equaled. To honor his guest, he then played him his just-completed B minor sonata. He turned expectantly toward Brahms—and his guest was fast asleep in his chair. Liszt stopped his performance and silently left the room. Here the usual legend breaks off, with all the implications coming from such a breach of good manners. But as a matter of fact Liszt bore him no ill-will, afterward found excuses for him, repeatedly urged him to stay on as his guest, released him only after a visit of several weeks, sent him away with a handsome present and never once alluded to the incident.

Then came his meeting with the Schumanns and the celebrated article in the Neue Zeitschrift. Brahms's attraction toward Clara Schumann, even before her husband's tragic end, and still more after it, seems to have been undeniably great, greater than many of the biographers have represented it. Specht speaks of it freely, though without suggestion of wrong-doing, as he does of Brahms's frequent inclination to young women later in life. Brahms might almost be compared in this respect to Beethoven, who was always in love with some young woman or other, though Brahms made none of his beloveds "immortal." But there were many of them, though he renounced them all because, as he himself explained, in his younger days he was not successful enough with the public to enable him to support a wife and because, as he informed one of his lady-loves, while he loved her and wished to hold her in his arms, he could not wear fetters and they must therefore part forever, which they thereupon did. And to many other young ladies, later in his life, he could not make up his mind to propose any more than he could make up his mind to accept a libretto for an opera. He used to couple them together; he wanted both and his loneliness throughout his life, without wife or child, Specht describes as something real and unrelieved in its pathos.

Specht gives a striking and living picture of the important periods in Brahms's life, and especially of his long years in Vienna, the part which the biographer knew of his own knowledge. Brahms went to Vienna for good in 1862. He soon made a name for himself there, gained friends and enemies, as composers do, especially one with so sharp a tongue as Brahms, and much against his own inclination became a figure pitted against Wagner in a long battle of musical esthetics. One of the most attractive sections of the book is Specht's picture of the Vienna of Brahms's time and of the personalities who surrounded him and were his friends. There was Hanslick, who, Specht thinks, never really understood the deeper part of Brahms, especially in the earlier years, whose "determinedly reverent attitude" toward his works Specht characterizes as a "mixture of hesitant admiration, conditional affection and apprehensive respect." There was a triumvirate, the third member of which was Billroth, the famous surgeon, at whose house all the later chamber music works received their first performance; a passionate, and as Specht more than hints, not always an understanding admirer. Gustav Nottebohm, the student of Beethoven's sketch-books, meant a great deal to Brahms as a "caricature of the master's own questionable traits and therefore a moral corrective." Carl Goldmark he liked, and often chaffed him unmercifully. Of Ignaz Brüll Brahms was especially fond because of his personality; his music has left little trace. Max Kalbeck, the portentious biographer, was the master's Kurwenal, going with him through thick and thin. These character sketches are apt and vivid and contribute something of value to our knowledge of Brahms. So, too, does Specht's discussion of Brahms's relations to other Viennese musicians; to Dvorak, whom he first started on the road to fame, but in whom he was later disappointed because of his excessive facility and lack of self-criticism; to Johann Strauss, of whose dances he was a well-known admirer; to Bruckner, whose music he held in abhorrence, and to Liszt, whose music he disliked still more; to Wagner, for whose music dramas he had a very real respect and in some cases liking, attested by numerous well-known anecdotes—notwithstanding the Baireuth master's frequent and nasty attacks. By Hugo Wolf's critical onslaughts he was amused, but for his songs he did not care much, without regard to the onslaughts. Richard Strauss's symphonic poems "outraged his feelings."

He was not fortunate with his own followers, of whom he had to put up with many. He endured tortures when he had to listen to works by friends that did not appeal to him. He was pained that he could not like the compositions of his ardent admirer Herzogenberg, husband of a still more ardent admirer and disciple. The course of true friendship with a man of Brahms's qualities could not run smooth, and there were not a few painful interruptions with some of his most intimate friends—with Clara Schumann herself, with Joachim, with Billroth, with others to whom he was sincerely and even devotedly attached.

An account of all these things so intelligent, so penetrating, so well coordinated, and above all so readable as Specht's, gives a true and convincing portrait of Brahms the man. No one has done one better, or, perhaps, so well. The criticism of Brahms the musician leaves room for a wider difference of opinion, and there will be, no doubt, a considerable divergence among the well-informed, candid and intelligent students of Brahms's works. But Specht's book will probably take its place as the best and most informing of Brahms's biographies.

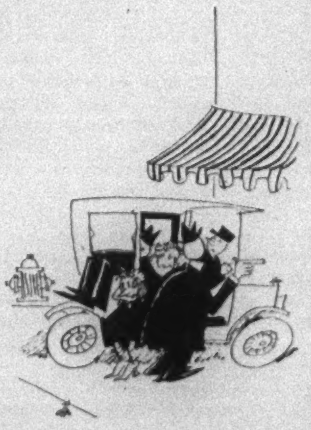
The Future of Dionysos in America

THE FUTURE OF DRINKING. By Gilbert Seldes. Drawings by Don Herold. Boston: Little, Brown & Co. $2.

By H. I. BROCK

ASSISTED toward a cosmic view of life (perhaps) by the recent close contact with Aristophanes involved in "adapting" to the modern stage the "Lysistrata" of the illustrious Athenian, Mr. Gilbert Seldes has tackled the paramount American topic and contrived a precarious appearance of avoiding that total loss of perspective which the subject so generally invites. Eventually the dizzy altitude of the pinnacle upon which he has to perch for the purpose so affects his head that he lets go the lariat of speculation and tries to sling fancy loops around the clouds. But while his vision is still clear he makes some valuable observations.

For example, and to begin with, he says that he does not undertake to foretell the future of prohibition. His concern is with drinking. As to that, he thinks the evidence justifies the conclusion that the prohibitionist, with all his admired and admitted political acumen, has mistaken the temper of the American people. Aliens have long marveled at the facility with which we are regimented, and our own politicians for generations have played on that facility with considerable success. On the other hand, statisticians have put us in the class of least law-abiding nations. Our docility is thus only apparent. While we give our zealots a free hand to make laws for us, we reserve to ourselves a wide discretion in obeying laws. This procedure becomes progressively easier as the ardor of the zealots multiplies the number of laws, piling upon the Pelion of Federal enactment the eight and forty Ossas of State legislation.



A Trip to Harlem, the Obligatory End to All Good Parties.

Thus is created a prodigious inverted pyramid. Besides the unstable equilibrium of the entire mass, resting upon its apex, the total number of laws is so great that not even the most fanatical law-abider can obey all of them. In a whole nation technically "felonized"—supposing everybody got his strictly legal due—a certain tenderness for the convicted felon is nourished. And every citizen in fact exercises a wider or narrower range of election among laws. Each one chooses to obey some laws—to disobey others. A variety of considerations affect the choice in any individual case, but so many people choose to disobey the prohibition law that it is one of the safest laws in the country to disobey—even for the bootlegger.

Mr. Seldes is not being quoted directly, of course. He uses a manner of provocative levity—has a sprightly Alexandrine fling. It is a manner much in vogue with our intelligentsia which is often as effective as it is annoying. In Mr. Seldes's case it is both. But, as has been suggested, maintenance of perspective calls for a neat balancing act on the pinnacle. The step must be light, the attitude airy, no matter how serious is the intent.

The idea is that the principle of the economy of not drinking, erected into an article of faith in the American religion of efficiency and evangelically promoted as a doctrine of salvation by certain sects and by big business, has in the course of human events subsequent to the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead act encountered an unexpected obstacle. That obstacle is the religion of drinking. What was once an indulgence—even when carried to excess—has become, says Mr. Seldes, a practice so hedged with divinity that misprision of felony is a sacred social obligation. In 1910 one might give drinking parties or not, as the fancy hit him. In 1930, one must give drinking parties, even if his soul is revolted by them. At a party one is no longer free not to drink. Lest these seem mere gratuitous assertions, Mr. Seldes clamps them down by posing a questionnaire. The doubter is thus dragged into court as affirmative witness.

More than that has come to pass, however. Where charity used to be extended to the drunkard, the sot is now sacred. He it is who sets the pace of every party. His is the privilege of spoiling the evening for any company in which he happens to be the first to arrive at the requisite stage of synthetic blessedness—that state of sublime complacency which blots out the sense of everybody's pleasure but his own. As Mr. Seldes sees it, the battle is joined between the religion of efficiency and the religion of drunkenness. His suggestion is that the religion of efficiency should win in the long run, since its inefficiency could hardly, even at the lowest valuation, fall below the inefficiency of drunkenness. Thus drinking would have no future.

But all calculations are upset by the factor introduced into the problem by the woman drinker. Mr. Seldes maintains that this factor is an utterly unknown and unpredictable quantity. He asserts that ten years' experience has afforded no clue to the mystery of how liquor will affect man's female fellow-citizen and economic rival. It seems that it is only since prohibition that the combination of woman and drink has become a vital consideration. The implication that prohibition is held responsible for this state of affairs is expressly repudiated. The fact—if it is a fact—is merely cited. With that fact accepted, the whole future of drinking recedes into the fog of the unknown.

It is at this point that the observer on the pinnacle begins to let go the loops and shoot off fireworks. Having admitted the romantic lure of the speakeasy, successor to the saloon as that refuge from the home for which the soul of man incorrigibly hankers, having spoken despitefully of even our pre-war taste in cocktails and drinks in general, having pointed out that dollar-mad Americans have not after all been quite dollar-mad enough to give up the week-end spree for the maximum output on Monday—and the profit accordingly to the employers—our seer can find nothing better to do than speculate upon the happy or unhappy results of a hypothetical transfer of "dominancy in drinking" from the male to the female. The argument runs this way: Woman will keep on drinking because there are still a lot of her who do not have to work. Man will stop drinking because there will be fewer and fewer men who do not have to work. Eventually disgusted, sober men will make all the women go to work.

So far has the flight of Mr. Seldes's fancy carried him from the ground—or even the precarious anchorage of his pinnacle. Nevertheless, he has put a lot of sound sense and valid observation in the earlier part of the book and made it short enough and snappy enough to be easy reading even in midsummer.

picion, and in the last chapter the reader is left to figure out the identity of the proprietor of the Nemo Club—where the stakes are high and the players haven't a chance. Highly placed personages, such as Lord St. Neots, who vanished as he lay contemplating the Canova Venus, are kidnapped and are not heard of again. As the inspector observes at the start of Number Naught, it is not playing the game to have murders and no bodies. However, that little omission is more than remedied as the story unfolds, for an epidemic of sudden deaths develops. The weird happenings are staged around the unhappy Jean Blyth, who has left her husband, and the most bizarre of all occurs in the Cosmic Museum amid the skeletons presided over by the curator, Mr. Cyrus Florian. The mild Mr. Florian is described as a spruce and elegant gentleman with short white whiskers and an air of bland prosperity. For those who are not squeamish, Number Naught is a hundred per cent.

THE HAMMERSMITH MURDERS. By David Frome. 294 pp. New York: Doubleday, Doran & Co., Inc. $1.

After reading half a dozen pages of this book it is quite apparent that anything is likely to happen at 60 Caithness Road, even before Commissioner Debenham of old reliable Scotland Yard gets the message informing him that a man is being murdered in that vicinity. Yet when Inspector Bull, a stout fellow but not too bright, looks in on the road, Sir Henry Dangerfield Pringle, Bart., M. D., F. R. C. S., K. C. B., diagnoses the cause of death as tetanus. This pronouncement cramps Bull's style, for the chief has been told that it is murder, and murder it must be. The inspector gets a bit muddled, then several other murders are committed, all of them linked to the theft of deadly phials from a physician's bag. The author discloses the agency of death at the outset and then suceeds in baffling the reader on the identity of the slayer. The book makes first-rate reading for a hot August afternoon.

Books of Humor

It is a moot question as to who is the most unfortunate, the week-ender, or the week-endee. Newman Levy, assisted by John Held Jr.'s spirited drawings, has given both sides an even break in a small collection of verses entitled, appropriately, "Saturday to Monday." These include the invitation and acceptance, with Strange-Interludish interpolations; the arrival and departure of the guests, and verses to be placed in a guest room. The spirit of cordiality, one fears, is hopelessly and humorously lacking in all of these.

Remember while you're here, you fool,
That this is not the Shelton Pool begin the lines on "The Bathroom," and:

I have given you the guest room
But it's really not the best room,
For the best room is the one I use myself is the beginning of a verse "For a Medium-Sized House," while the guest room verses for a small house are worth printing in their entirety.

The kids are asleep on the sofa
While the wife has to sleep on a cot
We pass it off brightly and act most politely,
But really we mind it a lot.

Of course we're delighted to see you,
May nothing your comfort here mar,
But you can't realize in a house of this size
What an awful damned nuisance you are.

This is not a book that can be placed with full immunity on the table in a guest room for the use of the visitor, but it would make a wonderful gift to send back to a host or hostess after the donor is safely in the city again.

MAN AND HIS UNIVERSE

By John Langdon-Davies

WHY has the human imagination willingly used up so much energy over scientific research? In this remarkably illuminating book an attempt is made to solve this riddle by surveying the entire record of man's search for an understanding of himself and of his universe. It gathers the experience of the past and prepares the reader for facing the scientific discoveries of the future.

Throughout, the reader is invited to live again during certain important periods in the development of scientific knowledge. With clever pen the author brings one into intimate contact with the men who dared to break away from tradition, and with the causes which influenced them to assert their independence. One by one the discoveries which these men have made have changed human thought regarding the most fundamental beliefs in philosophy and religion.

This book is up to the minute in its science and philosophy and far ahead of the times in its outlook on religion and human affairs.

John Langdon-Davies displays a clear understanding of the scientific questions which he considers, and his expert technique as a writer makes this book one of the best in its field. It is illustrated with reproductions of old engravings, diagrams from very early treatises, medieval woodcuts and portraits. 2nd Printing. $5.00

From Sun-Up to Bedtime in a Village of Old Mexico

Robert Redfield Returns From Tepoztlan With a Painstaking Yet Glamourous Account of Strange Customs

TEPOZTLAN, A MEXICAN VILLAGE. By Robert Redfield. 239 pp. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press. $3.

By C. G. POORE

LIKE an Elizabethan mariner returned from voyaging to far distant shores Mr. Redfield brings us strange news of the ways of life in a contemporary Mexican village. His book is a study heavily documented with the scrupulous notations of the research scholar. It contains admirable chapters on the organization of the village and the community, the division of labor and the material culture, the fine distinctions where folkways end and urbanity begins. There are appendices of terms and painstaking enumerations to delight the academic heart. But for all that the book is a chronicle of adventure into an unknown country, abysmally primitive according to our standards, yet with a glamour and tradition curiously stirring.

The population of present-day Mexico is a village population. There are almost no people living on scattered farms. Yet between village and village there is an infinite diversity. The benison of standardization has not yet been vouchsafed on a large scale. The people of one village, tilling their milpas four miles from the people in another, have totally different customs, because there is a difference of 2,000 feet in altitude, and this isolation and climatic variation show in their costumes, their work, and even in their marriage customs.

The conspicuous fact in the social geography of Mexico, Mr. Redfield reminds us, is the domination of the centre over the margins. On the high, cool, central plateau two-thirds of the population lives in two-thirds of the cities and towns. The plateau slopes down in all directions. The State of Morelos lies on the ladder of the southern escarpment. It is only the size of Maryland, but it has a descent of more than 8,000 feet. In each shelf or pocket of the mountains lies a village or a cluster of villages. Close underneath the row of peaks which forms the last bulwark of the escarpment is situated Tepoztlan. This village is the centre of a group of villages which is not four miles in radius, but which includes a descent of about 2,500 feet, from San Juánico at 7,000 feet to Santiago at about 4,500.

Whether the village is approached from above or from below it remains hidden in large part until it is actually entered. A density of trees, most of which bear either edible fruits or showy flowers, conceals the houses, which are all flat roofed and one story in height. Only the churches are taller; here and there they pierce the foliage. The great central church (templo mayor) on the plaza is by far the largest building in Tepoztlan; its great walls, crenelated to serve as battlements, and its two bell-towers dominate a village that, in rainy season, escapes into and is lost in foliage.

Entering from above or below one passes first through the milpas, small patches of ground where the corn and beans that feed the village are grown. The streets are paved with rough stones except in the central part. Many of them are very steep. No wheel ever moves in them; men and women carry the heavy burdens that must be moved. The houses are built of adobe or rough stones set in a mud mortar, or withes, wattle, or cornstalk. The roof is often tiled, but the floor is of dirt. Windowpanes and screens are rare—and so, for that matter, are window openings. But in front of the houses there are nearly always flowering plants. These usually grow in the ubiquitous oil cans that every one who has lived or traveled in Mexico knows.

The kitchen is the centre of activity. Here, as in the days before Columbus, the grinding stone, the flat clay tray on which tortillas are baked, the pot in which the beans are cooked, stand around the open fire. There are seldom chairs, and there aren't many other belongings. A metal bedstead is highly prized by the few who own one, and only the sewing machine represents mechanical civilization, here as in many other out-of-the-way corners of the earth. There is nearly always a domestic shrine in one of the rooms—or in the one room. It may be, Mr. Redfield tells us, no more than a printed or painted picture of a santo, but more commonly it is a carved and painted wooden figure, usually a Virgin or a Christ. In front of it there is an incense burner; flowers are before it in bottles or vases, and pictures of other saints surround it. Candles are burned before it on the many feast days, and gifts brought for birthdays or during the negotiations leading to a marriage are placed at its feet.

The men wear zarapes, white cotton trousers, enormous straw sombreros, sandals of leather or woven maguey fiber that are pre-Columbian in pattern. The machete knife with its curved tip is practically part of the costume. These are the clothes worn by los tontos, the "ignorant" people, just now more or less ascendant. The correctos—shopkeepers, wealthier people—incline toward dark trousers and real shoes. The women wear rebozos—immense colored cotton shawls—over clothes of a European lineage. The people take little interest in their government, which is chosen by the party in power at Cuernavaca, and Federal tax collectors are not welcomed. Unable to collect imposts, the municipal government is powerless to effect many local improvements. The people do not mind. They always find enough money for the feasts and the dancing and the religious rites of the countless fiestas, when the chirmitero plays, that wind through the year. They have their markets, where they all sit on stones or squat on the ground, exchanging the products of their localities; they learn the news of the day through gossip or songs, and when work is scarce and money is needed they go to neighboring places to labor and then the women sit up most of the night making tortillas for their men to eat while absent from home. In a straight line Mexico City is only fifty miles away, but there are no straight lines of travel in that country.

The people are a mixture of Indian and Spanish blood. They speak both Spanish and Nahuatl, and this essential bilinguality shows in their culture, which is neither aboriginal nor Spanish, but a close integration of both—Mexican. Tepoztlan was established long before the Conquest, and Martin, the son of Cortes, is said to have lived there. In the centuries since then they have had to leave their homes many times. During almost two years Tepoztlan was entirely depopulated except when Federal or Zapatista troops occupied the town. The way in which the people lived then was told to Mr. Redfield in a narrative of a Zapatista soldier which he includes in a footnote, and which in itself indicates the richness of his material in this book:

> In the time of the revolution, for a long period, Tepoztlan was entirely depopulated. The people went to Mexico, or to the hills. The hills north of the town are full of caves where people lived. Some built lean-tos of cornstalks under big trees. For a time there was enough food. We used to come down from the hills at night to get corn. If there was anybody in the town, it would be Federal troops. We would go very quietly, listening. If we heard nothing, we entered and took the corn. The people who owned fruit trees would come down from the hills by night to rob their own trees.
> The hills were the populated places, the towns the wild places. So we went into the towns to hunt. One day we were out of food. My Colonel asked me and some others to get a deer. But I said "There are no more deer in the hills. We must go to the towns for a deer." So we went into Santiago and there, among the banana trees, we found and killed a deer.
> Later on the food gave out. The cows and bulls had been hunted down and killed; the food was eaten up. If an orange was found it was taken quickly and eaten green. Many, many died of hunger, both soldiers and non-combatants. When, after this time, food was obtained again, some died because they ate too much. We began with a half tortilla at a time, and so escaped death from gorging.

The Zapatistas—or their descendants—have returned to Tepoztlan again, and Mr. Redfield has written a remarkably understanding record of their lives.

Three Dramatic Poems by Edgar Lee Masters

GETTYSBURG, MANILA, ANCOMA. By Edgar Lee Masters. 219 pp. New York: Horace Liveright.

SOME years have elapsed since Edgar Lee Masters contributed to American literature his "Spoon River Anthology." The passage of time works many changes, not only in a man's intellectual attitude toward life, but also in the social structure of the community. It is more than probable that Mr. Masters no longer has the same predilection for the sharp, ironic portraiture of his earlier days. And it is certain that American civilization, with an increase in communal spirit and with a decided increase in physical comforts, has smoothed down many of the angularities which formerly so often characterized an individual. Hence it is not just criticism of Mr. Masters to take him to task for not producing another "Spoon River." Edgar Lee Masters is a man of keen intellect, sympathetic adjustments to environment, and no little poetic skill. In "Gettysburg, Manila, Ancoma," three pieces in the dramatic manner, although only the last could be called other than closet drama, he indicates what he is working toward. And this is a larger interpretation of the spirit than he has hitherto undertaken, although such an interpretation was envisaged in his drama about Robert E. Lee.

Mr. Masters, if we read him aright, has one and the same thesis in each of his three dramatic poems. And this is, stated roughly and briefly, that loftiness of purpose, though it may conflict with the sequence of events (a sequence that history may justify, perhaps), is the sole criterion by which one is to be judged. Thus Wilkes Booth, who assassinated Lincoln, and Aguinaldo, who resisted the United States, were not assassin and rebel, but spiritual heroes because each followed what was for him the right course. This may seem highly metaphysical reasoning; and undoubtedly it is. But the metaphysics of right and wrong can be endlessly argued; and at the end each will, like Omar, go out the door wherein he went.

In "Gettysburg," Booth is represented as waiting outside the theatre to be told when Lincoln enters. During the time he waits he is in conversation with Payne, Atzerodt and Nancy; but, all told, there are fewer lines of dialogue than of soliloquy. There is Shakespearean feeling in the following excerpt, the lines of which have something of the Elizabethan's dramatic manner:

One universal substance, and one law
Predestine repetition when the wind
Of circumstance reblows, and Fleance escapes
Again and yet again to the end of time
So long as the currents of fate unite;
Yes, and as often Banquo dies to leave
Some Macbeth with an empty enterprise.

And there is a very deep lyric touch in Nancy's speech, which has not a little the pathos of Ophelia mitigating its sternness.

I sat amid the leaves and peered about,
Then chose where I had fallen for sleep, and paused
Some moments staring the misty sky, where curved,
Or leaned the thicket of trunks, or branches laced
The ashen overcast; or a few lonely leaves,
Still hanging, etched the silver around,
And no air stirred. It was the stillness of eyes
Where the enemy hide, or where the dead divine
The tragedy of men, and watch. With care,
With little rustling, I picked or scraped the leaves
To make a couch, and threw aside the hail
Of bullets, numbing to a sleeper's flesh;
Then as I laid I stared the sky.

And Booth:

You soul
Of Lady Macbeth which you so oft have played!

We pass over the "Manila" to come to "Ancoma," but principally for the reason that in this fragmentary American drama (which but for its brevity should not do badly on the stage). Mr. Masters proves that highly dramatic themes are to be found in New World history will writers but look for them.

Acoma (accented on the first syllable), the city of the sun, rises above the mesa of New Mexico as it did in 1580 when discovered by the Spaniards. Outwardly converted to Catholicism, the inhabitants are represented by Masters as still worshipers of the sun. Mr. Masters's poetic tragedy turns on the conflict of these two religious forces in the lives of Zetucupan and his daughter Jesuphe. The interwoven love-story is effective and poignant. The playwright has utilized the Greek device of the chorus to illuminate the drama's progress, and has done some very fine antiphonal lyrics for the old women of the village at their corn-grinding.

These three pieces by Edgar Lee Masters are, to our thinking, significant in American poetry, not only for themselves, but for the vistas they suggest. We trust not only that Mr. Masters will continue along this path but also that he will have followers. But we should like to see the intellectuality of the work more artfully concealed. And especially we should like to see more full-bodied characters. Mr. Masters's dramatis personae are too often mere voices and too seldom living people.

DR. EDWARD D. SNYDER, chairman of the English Department, Haverford College, has a new theory about poetry, or rather, about poetry of a certain type. Those poems whose effect is one of sound rather than sense (he calls them "spell-weaving poems") have, in his opinion, a hypnotic effect. He has conducted exhaustive experiments in reading poems aloud and has discovered that the rhythm employed in poems of this type is almost a perfect parallel to the half-second stimulus used by the hypnotist to produce a state of trance. In a book entitled "Hypnotic Poetry," to be published in November by the University of Pennsylvania Press, Dr. Snyder expains his theory and illustrates it by analyzing numerous well-known poems.

Two biographies of Mme. Roland are announced for early publication. One of them, "Madame Roland," by Madeleine Clemenceau-Jacquemaire (Longmans, Green & Co.), has already been mentioned in this column. It is scheduled to appear early in August or, possibly, late in July. The other, "A Lady Who Loved Herself: The Life of Madame Roland," by Catherine Young, wil be published some time in August by Alfred A. Knopf.

The story of what happened on the night of April 18, 1775, when Paul Revere, Dr. Prescott and Dawes made their famous ride, is told in a book, "Heroes of the Battle Road," to be published early in August by Perry Walton. The author is Professor Frank Wilson Cheney Hersey of the English Department of Harvard University. Professor Hersey has been gathering material for this book for several years and has amassed much new information.

One of the leading items on the list of books announced for Fall publication by the Century Company is "India; Land of the Black Pagoda," by Lowell Thomas. It is the result of Mr. Thomas's sixty-thousand-mile journey through India, said to be the longest journey ever made in that country by a white man. The book will be published early in October. Another important book on the Century Fall list is "Lafitte the Pirate," by Lyle Saxon. The biography of James Fenimore Cooper, which Walcott Boynton is doing for this publishing house is nearing completion, and the author hopes to have it ready for publication early next year.

Paulo Setubal's novel, "Domitila," previously announced for publication on July 18 by Coward McCann, has been indefinitely postponed. The author is said to be one of the most popular novelists in Brazil, and this is his first novel to be translated into English.

Dorothy Herzog, author of "Some Like It Hot" (Macaulay Company), sailed recently for Europe. Although she calls the trip a holiday, she expects to complete a new novel during her stay abroad.

The publishing house of Alfred A. Knopf reports that, although Hans Carossa's "A Roumanian Diary" received high praise from the reviewers, six salesmen were unable to sell more than 273 copies in advance of publication. Since there are about 2,000 booksellers in this country, this means that the vast majority of them refused to stock even a single copy. Bernard Smith of the Knopf publicity department wants to know why. We don't know. It looks to us like one of those things that no fellow can explain.

The first Fall publication date of Henry Holt & Co. will be Aug. 1. Among the books to appear on that day are: "By Way of Cape Horn," by A. J. Villiers, author of "Falmouth for Orders"; "The Cavalry Goes Through," a novel of the war as it might have been, by Bernard Newman; "The Silver King Mystery," a detective yarn, by Ian Greig; "Black Yeomanry," an account of an isolated group of Negroes off the South Carolina coast; "Criminal Justice in America," by Roscoe Pound; "The Tender Realist," a collection of essays by L. Wardlaw Miles; "The Silver Shell," a juvenile, by Mary Ellen Chase; "The Atom," by G. P. Thomson, and "An Anthology of English Poetry: Dryden to Blake," compiled by Kathleen Campbell.

The John Day Company has made arrangements with Carolyn Wells to edit a book of "The Best American Detective Stories of 1930." This is to be the initial volume of a series to be published annually of short thrillers by American authors.

Although university presses usually confine themselves to weightier tomes, the Yale University Press is issuing a series of books for children. The list includes two books of fairy tales by Ethel M. Gate, "All the King's Trumpets" and "Tales From the Enchanted Isles"; "The Garden of the Blynck," by Karle Wilson Baker, and "When Buffalo Ran," stories of Indian life before the white man came, told by George Bird Grinnell.

Sophie Cleugh's novel, "A Common Cheat," published a year or so ago by the Macmillan Company, is being translated into French by Madame Eve Paul Margueritte. It will first be published serially in the Echo de Paris, and afterward in book form.

A Chicago newspaper man, Loren Carroll, is the author of a novel, "Wild Onion," to be published soon by Dodd, Mead & Co. The story relates the rise and fall of a Chicago beer baron and presents a detailed picture of the racketeering business as it is carried on in the Windy City.

Alfred A. Knopf has accepted for future publication "The Silent Don," by M. Sholokhov, said to be the most brilliant novel that has come out of Soviet Russia. It tells of the wild Cossacks of the Don.

Arthur Guiterman has accepted an invitation from President Hamilton Holt to conduct courses in poetry writing during the Winter term at Rollins College, Winter Park, Fla., next year. He will succeed Jessie B. Rittenhouse, who has decided not to return to Rollins next year because of ill health. Mr. Guiterman was president of the Poetry Society of America from 1927 to 1929 and president of the Authors' League Fellowship from 1925 to 1929. He is the author of "The Light Guitar," "Ballads of Old New York," "The Laughing Muse," "Chips of Jade" and several other books of light verse.

Bellamy Partridge, former editor of Brentano's Book Chat and author of "Amundsen, the Splendid Norseman," has written a gay novel, "A Pretty Pickle," which Brewer & Warren will publish about the middle of August. It is the story of a young man who is trying to keep out of two marriages and the pickle business, all at the same time.

Martha Ostenso's novel, "The Young May Moon," has just been published in German by Tauchnitz. The price paid for the translation rights is said to be the highest paid for any book included in the Tauchnitz library. WARE W. WIMBERLY, who writes in the August number of Scribner's Magazine under the heading "A Parson Looks at Prohibition," is a Protestant minister in the State of Iowa and is, so far as we are able to gather from his article, personally dry. But he is not in favor of prohibition, and he resents "the assumption of the Anti-Saloon League that their methods and aims are identical with those of the Church." "There are worse sins than drinking liquor," says Mr. Wimberly. "There are even worse sins than advocating an open saloon. And among them are self-righteousness and the attempt to legislate and club unwilling souls into the kingdom of Heaven." Mr. Wimberly reminds us that the Founder of the Church did not use coercion. "He taught, preached and set an example." * * * "He staked all on the force He called love. He discounted force, swords and statutes, believing that all of them were futile unless love could take possession of the soul of mankind." Mr. Wimberly believes that the ideals of Jesus are being vindicated by the failure of coercion to cope with the evils of intemperance. In conclusion he says:

> When Jesus said, "The kingdom of God is within you," He disclosed not only the heart of His gospel but the panacea for most human ills. For when that kingdom is within us, it will express itself in laws that will be obeyed and not in laws that my self-respecting, ordinarily law-abiding and Christian neighbors feel compelled to break. Consequently, the Church had better leave militant measures of reform to the reformers and busy itself with the greater task of building up, through teaching, preaching and example, the kingdom of righteousness in the hearts of its children. For the mailed fist has failed as often as it has been tried, producing nothing but an impossible social and political tangle. It is time that we began to place our emphasis on the quieter and more effective method of enlightenment through instruction. If the Church exalted such a method, it would lose many adherents and it might even die. But, having perished, it might know the splendor of a resurrection and awake to find its ideals vindicated.

In The Mentor for July is an article by Charles J. V. Murphy on "Frozen Millions." The reference is to trust funds established by charitable-minded persons who desire that their money shall continue to do good after they are dead, but who so limit the purpose for which the funds are to be used that changing conditions often render the bequests cumbersome and useless. The author cites many cases of such trust funds, among them the famous Sailors' Snug Harbor fund established by Captain Robert Richard Randall, which has grown to such proportions that the trustees find great difficulty in expending the income for the purpose for which the fund was created. Since they are not permitted to use it for other purposes, the millions involved may well be said to be "frozen." As a means of preventing the future "freezing" of trust funds, Mr. Murphy advocates the establishment of community trusts, such as the one set up by the late F. H. Goff in Cleveland. This provides for a non-profit-taking administration staff for persons who desire to bequeath sums, large or small, for the public welfare. Those who entrust funds to this organization are asked not to bind the trust with too specific instructions, but to empower the trustees to make such changes in the administration of the funds as shall in time become necessary or expedient.

The Joseph McCabe Magazine is a new periodical published twice each month by Haldemann-Julius Publications, Girard, Kan. The initial number in its entirety is written by Joseph McCabe and constitutes the first volume of his "History of Morals." It bears the subtitle "The Morals of the Savage," and it is to be followed in the next issue by "Morals in the Ancient World." Mr. McCabe does not deal solely, or even chiefly, with sexual morality, a subject which he treated exhaustively in an earlier work. He studies, rather, the beginning of all rules of human conduct, in so far as these beginnings can be inferred from the ideas of primitive tribes. He finds, among other things, that even savages have laws which they do not choose to obey, although they continue to acknowledge them as laws.

The National Geographic Magazine for July has descriptive articles on "Norway, a Land of Stern Reality," "North America's Oldest Metropolis" (Mexico City), and "Today on the Yukon Trail of 1898." The writers of these articles, in the order given, are Alfred Pearce Dennis, Frederick Simpich and Amos Burg. Besides the numerous photographic reproductions in black and white, there are two series of color photographs, "Fjords and Fjells of Viking Land," by Gustav Heurlin, and "Adventures in Color on Mexico's West Coast," by Fred Payne Clatworthy.

The subject of the May-June Bulletin of the New York Zoological Society is "The Poisonous Serpents of the New World." Raymond L. Ditmars has assembled and presented in a concise and non-technical manner the most essential information about venomous snakes in North and South America and the adjoining islands, together with pictures of the various species and maps showing their distribution. These maps will repay careful study. One learns from them that the only part of the United States entirely free from poisonous serpents is the extreme Northeastern section, including most of Maine and parts of New Hampshire and Vermont. One learns too—and this will undoubtedly surprise many readers—that there are no venomous serpents in the larger islands of the West Indies—Cuba, Haiti, Porto Rico and Jamaica. Most of the smaller islands, too, are free from dangerous reptiles. Besides the descriptions and pictures of the various species of serpents, the bulletin includes some information about "Antevenins for Snake Bite" and a bibliography of books for the student who desires more extensive information. Copies of the bulletin may be had at the offices of the New York Zoological Society, 101 Park Avenue, New York City. The price is 35 cents.

THE rise and fall of Otto Munson, financier de luxe, has been chronicled by Mr. Shepard as an amusing satire on sudden wealth and what it can do to supposedly normal men. In "So I said to Mr. Morgan," the author has taken his hero from the umbrella rib business, brought him to sudden riches and many mistresses, and plunged him, in the stock market crash, back to where he was before he became the possessor of a million and a hundred dollars.

Told in the first person by Otto himself, who prides himself on his nickname of "Do-it-in-a-second-Otto," the story rollicks along, keeping the reader in the best of humor.

> During the years that I was president and sole owner of Peerless Umbrella Frames, Inc. [says Otto], I was commonly regarded as one of the smartest men in umbrella ribs. Our sales meetings were knockouts, if I do say so myself. It was I personally who started the campaign against slickers. * * * But the big deals I was in last year never made me snooty to the original business which gave me my start. I guess it's just because I'm that kind of a guy.

Gold-digger after gold-digger wins her way into Otto's heart. His wife divorces him. The system by which he buys and sells stocks would make a broker turn over in his swivel chair. In less than a year Otto has made a million dollars, all of which he puts into the National City Bank. When the crash comes, he crashes with it, but he is not daunted. He asks his creditors to advance him $20,000 with which to begin again, asks the government to extend his time for income tax, and expects to begin again in just a few days now. Among the many humorous literary efforts that the financial status of the country has called forth, Mr. Shepard's book is one of the best. Less wisecracking than quietly satirical, it should be a good present for any one who is beginning or ending market operations.

Sheer nonsense, of that type in which sentence follows sentence with merely the barest sequence, if any, "Aren't Men Rascals," will seem like pure drivel to many for whom the non-sequitur has no allure. Mr. Harding has gone Donald Ogden Stewart, who is a master at this, four or five better. Not only have his chapters no connection, but at times even his words get lost among his vocabulary and become mere verbal pyrotechnics.

> They were destined for each other. His aura was a delicate shade of heliotrope, and her metabolism exactly dovetailed his. He was a hypochondriac; she suffered from chronic euphoria, so a well-behaved justice of the peace poured them together and they seemed to neutralize each other. No morphological differences between the isolated male and female organisms were apparent, in the clothes they affected, but she smoked cigarettes under water.

This is good sense compared to most of the stuff, yet now and then a chapter rises to the surface and one gets an almost consecutive and very delightful picture of a church entertainment, an attempt to explore a cathedral (the explorers never got beyond the boilers and furnaces in the basement), or a sermon by the Bishop.

> About at the start of this I sat down accidentally ahead of the rest and then tried to keep a very tiring half-rising position as if I were just coming down or going up, for I never knew when the rest of the congregation might sit and wanted to be ready for any emergency.

Loren Stout's drawings add to the general confusion. A very special sense of humor is necessary to appreciate this brand of idiocy—all other comers will be bored. But it should be great for a vocabulary tester, if nothing else.

The success magazines and systems have been kidded by almost every humorist looking about for something easy to kid, and Mr. Fishman's little volume, "It's Still Bologney" is the work of one of the grand line. In it the author has taken up each separate system: Overcoming Fear, Keeping Fit, The Trained Man Wins, The Man Who Knows, and others, and has shown just where each has been perfected to the vanishing point. Trained prohibition agents, for example, become > * * * so expert that they could detect a clink, or even a tinkle, for that matter, which was practically inaudible to the naked ear. Indeed, many members of the Clink and Tinkle Unit did such excellent work that they were promoted to the Shirt Front Unit, the members of which go around sticking pins in shirt fronts in order to drain out liquor which citizens may be carrying in hot water bags around their necks.

The Five-Foot Shelf short-cut to success falls too short when > * * * a well-known college professor shortened them to 2 feet 3¼ inches. Another professor planned to reduce the books to powder, so could be dissolved in gin and injected into the student hypodermically, but his plan had to be abandoned because most of the students were found to be so thick that it was impossible to get a needle which would puncture them.

Footnotes supplement the text profusely, while Mr. Roth's drawings catch the success experts in various attitudes of pointing and exclaiming "Don't tell me you never had a chance," "Are you afraid to face the truth about yourself?" and "How do you KNOW you can't WRITE?" Testimonials from murderers who have used the various methods and succeeded, and one in particular from E. L. J., of Pink River Junction, Me., who for many years had been troubled by wives and other blemishes, are particularly delightful, as are correspondence school yells such as

Yi! Yi! Yi! Yi! Yi! Yi!
Soak 'em with an alibi;
An alibi the business does,
Proves you wasn't where you was,
Shows that you had took a nap and
Didn't even know it happened.
Not guilty! Not guilty! Not guilty!

"Casanova Jones," one suspects, is a not very forceful attack on the prohibition enforcement system in the form of a rhymed novel, or possibly only a rhymed short story. Cass is a prohibition agent, who, in lieu of paying alimony to a divorced wife, furnishes her with liquor from Medicinal Moe's for her speakeasy. Annabel Cloy is

A poetess, she, a poetical siren,
With negligent air of a feminine
Byron.

Cass falls in love with her, and has her poems published, but only by a printer who does bottle labels. Annabel is annoyed, and starts prohibition trouble, which finally involves a great many people, including a college president, who stand on street corners selling liquor openly in order to become martyrs and be put in prison.

None of this is very funny excepting an occasional rhyme. Cass, for instance, is

A gentleman sober, a gentleman
blotto,
But always a gentleman—that was his motto.

Mere tricky rhyming and clever illustrations are not enough, however, to make the book an outstanding success.

... A Lost Soul Tells Her Story These are the actual diaries of a prostitute and dope fiend. They form one of the most important human documents uncovered in our time. Mary Austin says, "The book is all the more important because it has none of the patronizing moral undertone found in the studies of social workers, and none of the sympathetic magic wrought by the practised litterateur . . . It stands by itself as a first hand account of a wasted woman."

It tells the story of her many lovers and of her passion for the only man she ever loved, and still loves; how she first took dope; the torture of realizing her degradation. She was a hustler chased from town to town, preyed upon by the police and unscrupulous detectives, thrown out of hotels at night, trailed and cheated by dope peddlers. There is a scene in a 'sporting house' that has no parallel in literature.

Books on Economics

By GEORGE SOULE

The Economics of Branch Banking. By Bernhard Ostrolenk. 209 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $3.50.

MR. OSTROLENK of the editorial staff of The Times Annalist here reviews the recent growth of branch banking in the United States, hampered as it is by legal restrictions which prevent national banks from establishing branches outside their localities. The McFadden law, which permitted some latitude in this respect, has not stopped the tendency of national banks to change over to State banks on account of the greater opportunity for extension under State laws. The author argues the case of unified as opposed to small unit banking, adducing its greater strength and its potentiality as a stabilizing force in agriculture and industry. He cites the examples of the United Kingdom and Canada. Group or chain banking, which affiliates unit banks by means of holding companies, is a way of getting around the law, and has had a rapid development for that reason; but it places ultimate banking control outside the established institutions created for that purpose, such as the Federal Reserve System. Mr. Ostrolenk believes that if we do not permit the orderly development of branch banking we shall nevertheless have unified banking in other, less controllable and less desirable form. The subject will undoubtedly be much discussed at the next regular session of Congress.

Millions in Mergers. By H. A. Toulmin Jr. 323 pp. New York: B. C. Forbes Publishing Company. $3.50.

In popular magazine style, this book discusses the recent merger movement. After a little history, indicating briefly the distinguishing features and the flaws of the gentleman's agreement, the pool, the trust, the corporation and the holding company, the author presents a large number of the more superficial facts about prominent mergers in the United States. In general terms he warns the reader that a merger cannot succeed if it attempts to substitute size for good management, and he believes that attempts to make profit by monopoly methods rather than by public service are bound to fail, though he lists as one of the sound purposes of the merger the control of harmful competition. He sketches some of the abuses of the merger movement. His attitude, however, is uncritical; no searching analysis is applied to any specific concern; and the assumption running through the book is that any merger which has shown a profit is both a safe investment and a servant of the public good. A final chapter deals with the tests of legality. It is optimistically concluded that if the merger arises from proper motives, is conducted on principles of fair play and renders a public service, it will be lawful, and also that if it does not do these things it cannot succeed. Hence all is for the best in the best of business worlds.

Watch Your Selling Dollar. By Archibald M. Crossley. 354 pp. 32 pp. of colored graphs. New York: B. C. Forbes Publishing Company. $5.

The former director of research of The Literary Digest has produced a book for the manufacturers, now extremely numerous, who are beginning to suspect that while they have been making great progress at reducing costs of production much of the gain has been leaking out through wasteful methods of distribution. The volume provides a good deal of information as to how marketing research should be and should not be conducted, what sort of leaks to look for and what principles to follow in outlining policy. The author's emphasis is upon the importance of the viewpoint of the purchaser rather than that of the seller, and upon stabilization of business rather than upon unsound attempts to accelerate sales. In passing, he neatly punctures a good deal of the selling talk which advertising men sometimes hand out to manufacturers, and shows how the claims of advertising media may often be false to the facts, even though honestly presented. Though advertising has proved its power to increase demand—including the demand of manufacturers for advertising—it must, according to the author, devote more attention to the profit at which the advertised article is sold.

People vs. Wall Street. By William Floyd. 272 pp. New York: The Vanguard Press. $2.50.

A mock trial, in which an imaginary spokesman of Wall Street is put upon the stand and cross-examined at great length about the practices, not only of the exchanges, but of the entire economic system in the United States, with reference to small investors, consumers and labor. The author is extremely cynical concerning the defenses made for the existing system, and makes his points mainly by bringing out inconsistencies among the several statements of defenders of present-day capitalism and between some of these statements and the actual facts. Specific utterances and instances in great profusion furnish the material for the examination. Among the subjects covered are the inflation and crash of 1929, the growth of mergers and holding companies, the philosophy of high wages as contrasted with the statistical records of wage movements, the attitude toward labor organization, unemployment, the practices of the utilities under regulation, the exploitation of patriotism for the benefit of armament manufacturers. Though the development of the argument is not very logical, some of the points are telling. The ironic nature of the book is pointed out at the end, when the jury brings in a verdict that the defendant is not guilty and the people is insane.

Trust and Corporation Problems. By Henry R. Seager and Charles A. Gulick Jr. 719 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $5.

This is one of the few exhaustive reviews of the trust problem by competent and impartial economists which has appeared since the renewed wave of combination and merger which followed the World War, and since the recent economic studies of the necessities of economic control in industries such as oil and coal. It is thorough and responsible, and should serve either as a college text or as an authority for the lay reader, the business man and the legislator. It traces the history of the corporation in the United States and of the theories relating to combinations, and recounts the fortunes, economic and legal, of typical combinations such as those in oil, tobacco, shipbuilding, steel, farm machinery and shoe machinery. It reviews the trade association movement and the operation of the various anti-trust laws and the Federal Trade Commission. The American attitude is contrasted with that of Germany and other countries. The authors conclude that combinations have so great a potentiality for good, especially in the way of exercising a control of the economic order in the public interest, that our historical atttitude toward them should be altered; that they should be encouraged but placed under proper forms of public regulation.

Railroad Consolidation. By Julius Grodinsky. With an introduction by Emory R. Johnson. 331 pp. New York: D. Appleton & Co. $3.50.

An economist of the Wharton School of Finance of the University of Pennsylvania here reviews railroad consolidation from the economic rather than the legal point of view. Why has the drive for consolidation continued so persistently in the face of repeated disapprovals of specified plans, under the law, by the Interstate Commerce Commission? The idea of the author is that the main motive for the attempted consolidations is not to obtain operating economies, nor is it chiefly a matter of finance; it is to influence the movement of traffic. It enables "the acquiring roads to capture the business of the acquired roads, to force its movement over the line of the acquired road and away from its competitors." This, he thinks, may be a good thing for the public under proper regulation. But consolidation is not likely to make possible lower rates through operating economies. It may improve service and facilitate technical development which stronger companies may undertake. In addition to elaborating this theory, the book furnishes a large amount of information about the traffic and finances of individual railroads, used as illustrative material.

New Mystery Stories

Lady of the Night. By Sydney Horler. 307 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

ONE of the choicest collections of villains to be encountered anywhere in the mystery field is presented in this sleep-banisher by the gifted Mr. Horler, who learned about crooks during his journalistic days and nights in London. The good old Secret Service of the British Government functions superbly, as usual, although Stadenfeld, that arch crook, is a blade worthy of the agents' steel. The excitement begins on a train tearing through the night near Avignon, where murder is done. Thrilling events and slayings follow in London, all the handiwork of a crime master. A Black Book, which provides social luminaries with much anxiety, figures in the story. The lady of the night, who is in hot pursuit of the book, is constantly at Death's elbow, thanks to the smooth gentleman who is back of all the evil. The book moves at a swift pace and is not recommended to those whose nerves are not under good control.

The Yellow Crystal. By Anthony Wynne. 303 pp. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

The benign Dr. Hailey appears once again in this mystery yarn and not altogether at his best. Sir John Oldmay, an upright but exceedingly dull person, has been murdered. He was slain while indulging in the sturdy custom of taking a dip in the sea before breakfast, a hardy adventure on the average British morning. He had quarreled with his son and heir, had had words with his wife, and his relations with his daughter were far from amicable. There the matter rests, with a highly suspicious actor, who was visiting the Oldmays, thrown in for good measure. The good Dr. Hailey, the police and a friend of the dead man, Professor Carpenter, do some mathematical calculations on the time it took the slayer to remove Sir John, and it is all rather boring. In the end the average reader will awaken with a start to discover that it was the Yellow Crystal after all, and no doubt will hope that Dr. Hailey, usually so diverting, will stay away from crystals in the future, no matter what their color.

Murder on the Bridge. By Lynn Brock. 269 pp. New York: Harper & Brothers. $2.

This Colonel Gore case, involving the puzzling fate of a physician, is commended without reservation. It will be a shrewd student of detective yarns who solves the secret of the slaying of Dr. Melhuish and penetrates the shield of angelic innocence which protects the person responsible for the crimes. By way of novelty Mr. Brock has introduced members of the old gangs of New York, giving due credit to Herbert Asbury as the Boswell of the flash gangsters. There is not a dull second from the moment that Dr. Melhuish disappears in the fog on the bridge, where he had been lured by a false call from a patient, until the leader of the criminal band is unmasked. Colonel Gore appears to be outclassed throughout most of the book while Inspector Lord of the local police is baffled by a death as obvious as that of Woodbine, a tramp so-called because of his affection for fag ends of the cigarette bearing that name. Suspicion is switched about until the reader is completely bewildered in his hunt for the murderer which, after all, is just as it should be.

The Piccadilly Ghost. By Erle Spencer. 298 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.

Stephen Mallowes—they called him Christchurch Mallowes at the university—attains the ambition of every cub reporter. He is assigned to cover an unimportant suicide for The Daily Cry, and observe how he does it! Naturally, the death on Vauxhall Bridge was a murder and Mallowes has more than his share of good luck. The ghost and a decidedly personable young thing are introduced into the reporter's sphere in a musty old basement in Piccadilly. Then things happen. The proprietor of The Daily Cry has been casting about for a new sensation for his readers and the ghost does the trick. When a man answering an advertisement is killed on The Cry's doorstep the proprietor is concerned for the honor of his journal. Helmsley, the crime expert, and Mallowes do their part and the ghost is laid. There is considerable gasping when the investigators break into the ancient tunnel under the art gallery in Piccadilly.

The Murder of Cecily Thane. By H. Ashbrook. 293 pp. New York: Coward-McCann, Inc. $1.50.

Almost any one at all might have been responsible for the death of Mrs. Thane in this first detective story venture by Miss Ashbrook. It is ingeniously worked out with a police inspector taking a hand who more nearly approximates the average metropolitan operative than any fictional policeman of recent years. Mrs. Thane is found dead in front of a safe which apparently has been rifled. There are striking points of parallel between her murder and that of Greta Schlockenhass, which, in turn, is reminiscent of a comparatively recent crime in real life. Night clubs and gigolos figure in the story. The case eventually is cleared up through the efforts of Spike Tracy, whose brother is district attorney of New York County in the first chapter, but, by one of those little slips, is district attorney of Kings in the fourteenth chapter. Spike's police methods are unusual and amusing.

Number Naught. By Seldon Truss. 278 pp. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.

Now this one is just about all right. It has steel shutters, electrified floors, a gallery of unusual criminals, a terrible old man and a diversified assemblage of shudders. Even the elect of Scotland Yard are not immune from sus-

A Victorian Who Has Come Into Fashion

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS. By G. F. Lahey, S. J. 172 pp. New York: Oxford University Press. $3.

GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS, a poet-priest dead in the year 1889, has recently been the object of a revival based more upon the tendencies which he represents than upon the specific qualities of his work. A rebel in the days when the stars of the Victorian constellation were at their brightest, he created no vast stir in the poetic atmosphere of his own times; but at the present day, when rebellion is so common that it has become almost rebellious not to revolt, he has been seized upon by the exponents of modernism, and his work and his artistic creed have been aired in a manner that rarely befalls a half-forgotten poet of another generation.

Whatever one may think of Hopkins's theories and accomplishment, one must admit that he was a daring experimenter, an originator who sought new poetic worlds to conquer. And an unusual interest, accordingly, attaches to Mr. Lahey's volume of biography and criticism, wherein the facts of Hopkins's rather uneventful life are set forth, and wherein the principles of his work are discussed and analyzed. In his early years, as the book abundantly manifests, Hopkins displayed a marked poetic aptitude; and one would not have to read more than one poem such as the following to realize that he had the gift of lyricism:

I have desired to go
Where springs not fail,
To fields where flies no sharp and sided hail
And a few lilies blow.

And I have asked to be
Where no storms come,
Where the green swell is in the heavens dumb,
And out of the swing of the sea.

In such a vein was Hopkins's early work—but such poetry gave no indication of the revolution that was in store. There came a time when Hopkins, defying his parents' wishes, joined the Roman Catholic Church; there followed seven fallow years—an interval that makes one doubt the strength of his poetic impulse; then once more he turned to poetry, but with theories of prosody that were as audacious as they were disturbing. Various new devices, such as "Counterpoint Rhythm," "Spring Rhythm," and "Running Rhythm," were extensively employed—devices that must be observed in practice in order to be appreciated. Aside from tolerating rhymes such as "England" and "mingle and", "boon he on" and "communion", and "justices" and "eye he is", these contrivances gave rise to lines such as the following:

To what serves mortal beauty—dangerous; does set dancing blood. . . .

or, again:

A Bugler boy from barrack (it is over the hill
There)—boy bugler, born, he tells me, of Irish Mother to an English sire (he Shares their best gifts surely, fall how things will).

To the follower of Modernistic verse, such work will not seem unusual; it is quite in line with what is being done nowadays by many poets who are reaping high praise. And one has no difficulty, consequently, in understanding why the Modernists have been ready to take Hopkins to their hearts. Yet one cannot help agreeing with Mr. Lahey that Hopkins's principles tend "to destroy the rhythmic or at least the rhyming architectural substructure" of his work; indeed, they leave it with about the same resemblance to poetry as a random daub bears to a masterpiece of painting. One cannot accept Mr. Lahey's view that Hopkins's later work—as revealed in the examples which he presents—shows any of the signs of greatness; and while the writer's unpretentious earlier productions do manifest an undeniable poetic talent, one is inclined to wonder whether the verse of his final years, with its impossible rhythms and its air of freakishness and affectation, would not have been more kindly treated had it been allowed to remain in that oblivion to which Hopkins's contemporaries seemed content to consign it?

Like the two brothers in "Chances" Major Gibbs (brother of Sir Philip Gibbs and Cosmo Hamilton) was educated at the College de St. Malo in Brittany, and at Oxford. When Major and Mrs. Gibbs are not preserving their summer tans on the Riviera in the winter, they live in a Colonial farm-house at Lakeville, Mass.

(Mrs.) Jeannette Phillips Gibbs

Maybe it was marrying a Gibbs that brought out Jeannette Phillips Gibbs' unsuspected talent for novel writing. At any rate, she gave up practising law (she is a member of the Massachusetts and New York Bars) when she married Major Gibbs in 1919, and has fallen in enthusiastically with the family tradition of novel writing. "French Leave", her third novel, promises to be one of the season's successes.

Mrs. Gibbs' sparkling novel of Bohemian Paris (just published) has won high advance praise from America's two largest wholesalers of books. One calls it "perhaps the outstanding book of the period", while the other says "this is different. One of the best bets on the list. Get it."

IN THE LAIR OF THE RUM-RUNNERS

A Visit to the Lonely Isle of St. Pierre Reveals a Big Fleet of Contraband Carriers and a Highly Organized System of Supplying Liquor to the Bootleggers of the American Seaboard

Since Canada laid an embargo on the exportation of liquor across the American border, the rum-running trade of the tiny French island of St. Pierre has increased to a marked degree. The writer of the following article has just returned from a visit to the island, where he explored the methods of the rum-runners and their organization.

By JAMES C. YOUNG

ST. PIERRE

THE stanch ship Farnorth had been poking along in the fog, looking for something.

"Two points over," said her skipper, peering ahead, as he had been peering for an hour. Then, "Steady!" and we were in the channel for St. Pierre, world's end.

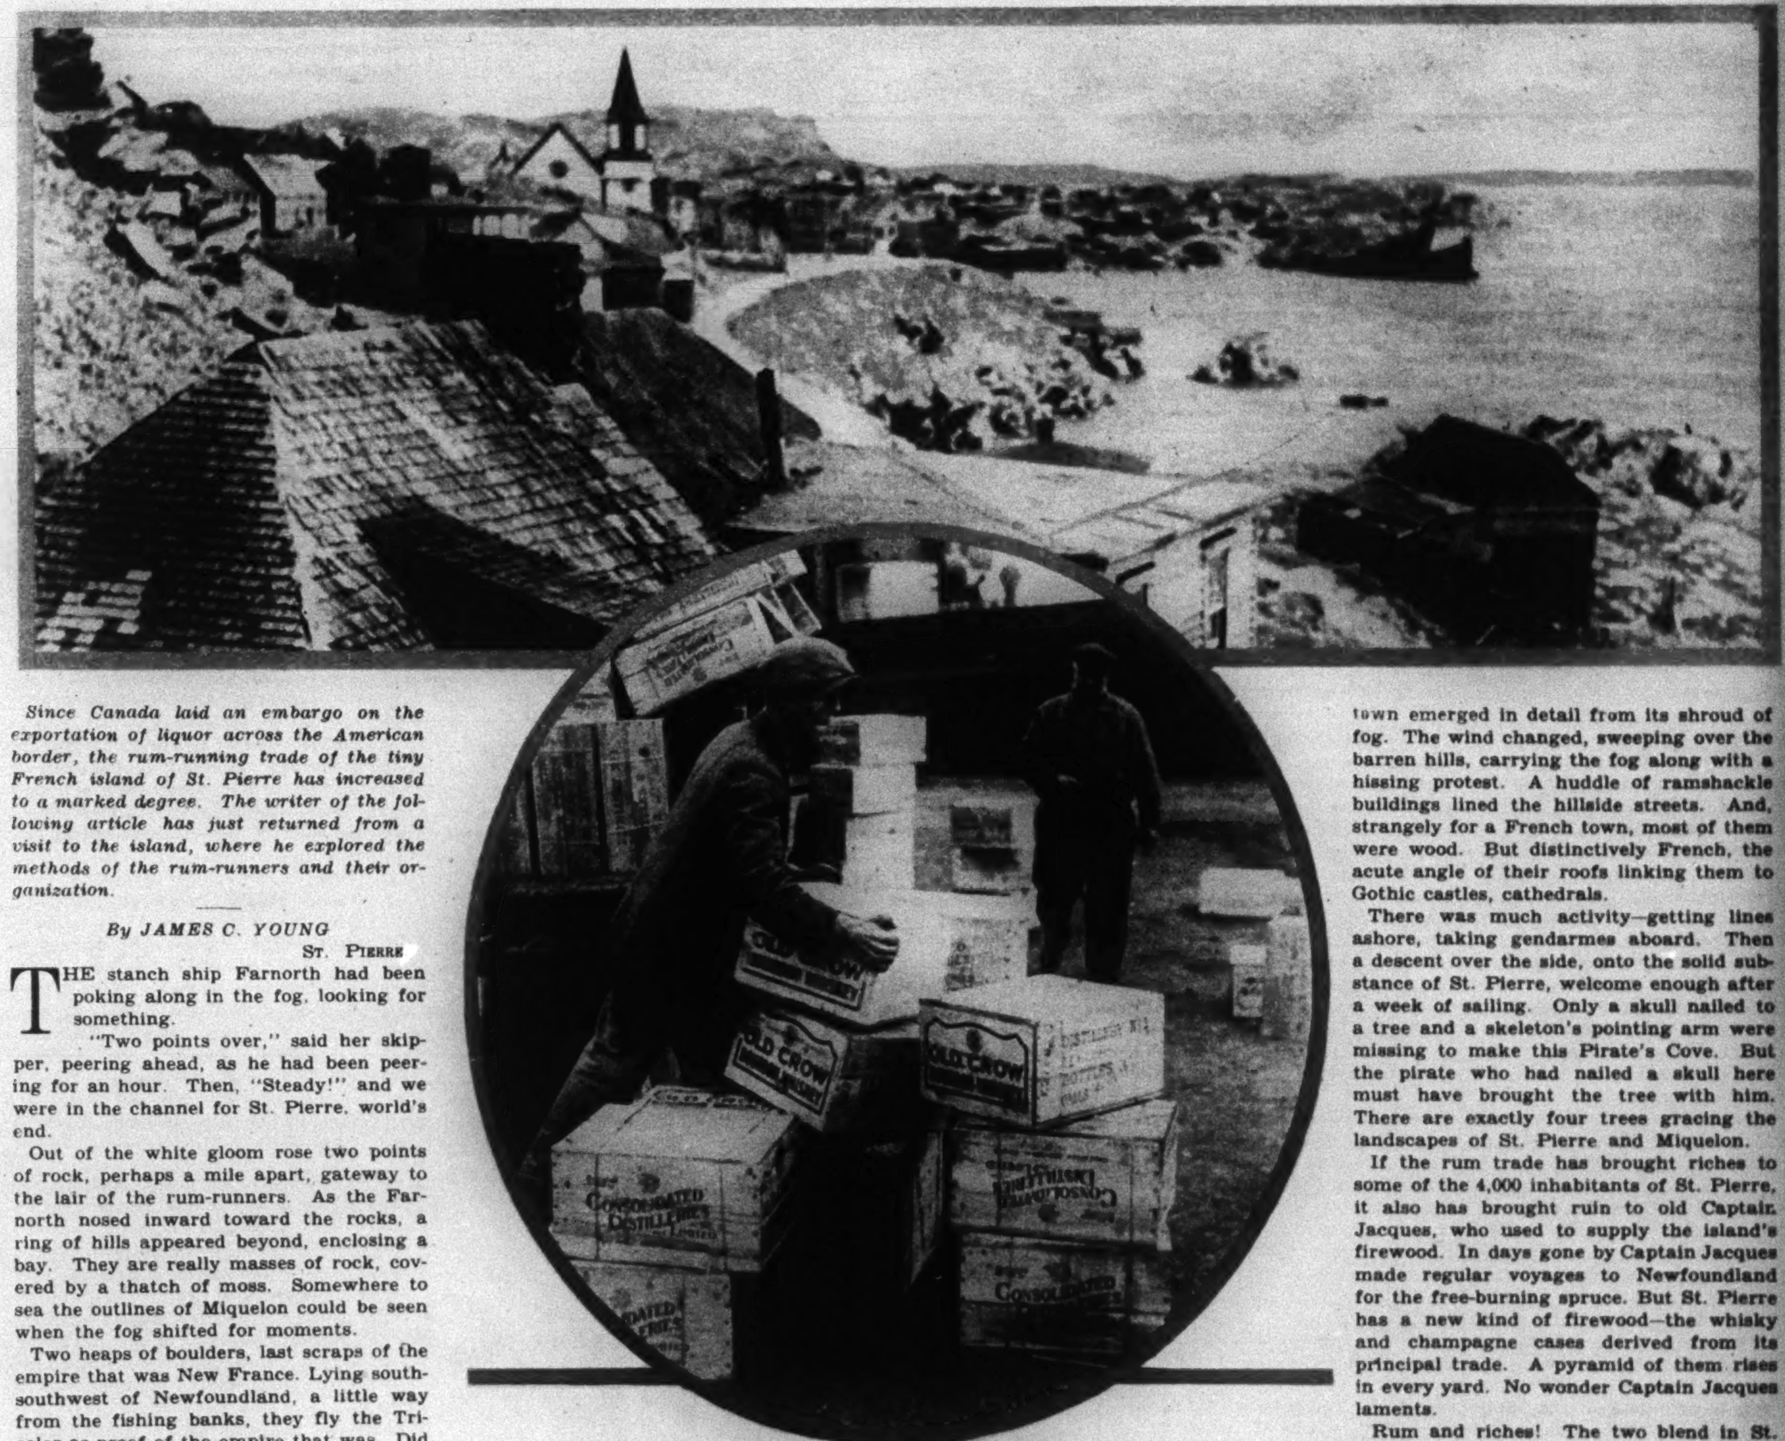
Out of the white gloom rose two points of rock, perhaps a mile apart, gateway to the lair of the rum-runners. As the Farnorth nosed inward toward the rocks, a ring of hills appeared beyond, enclosing a bay. They are really masses of rock, covered by a thatch of moss. Somewhere to sea the outlines of Miquelon could be seen when the fog shifted for moments.

Two heaps of boulders, last scraps of the empire that was New France. Lying south-southwest of Newfoundland, a little way from the fishing banks, they fly the Tricolor as proof of the empire that was. Did old Jacques Cartier first land here upon that voyage of his in 1534?

It seems probable. Anyway, Cartier, Champlain, La Salle, all passed this outpost of empire. To the northwest the St. Lawrence, that highway of French adventuring, still empties into the sea, though its explorers and their race no longer are masters here. Roundabout icebergs sail majestically in the lonely seas, and sportive whales fill the air with spray. Most of all, there is the sad, cold fog, wrapping the world.

We were in the gateway now, the pinnacles of rock towering above. Swaying spars appeared, rising from invisible ships. Then we saw the ships vaguely, like wraiths—surely pirate craft bearing treasure. But a modern kind of pirate craft—rum-runners at rest in their last great lair.

Once beyond the gates, St. Pierre unfolds in its somber isolation. And the ear picks up the sound as of a lowing cow, ending in a tremble—mooo-oo-o-o. It is the fog warning on Gallantry Head. St. Pierre—a straggling town of wood and plaster, grouped at one side of the bay, opposite Dog Island and another mite of a town. The spires of their churches raise crosses toward the fog-bound skies.



THE LONELY CITADEL OF RUM-RUNNING.
A View of the Rock-Bound Harbor of St. Pierre Is Shown at Top, and (Below) Cases of Liquor Discharged From a Canadian Ship.

St. Pierre was settled by the French at an early time, then burned by the British and rebuilt and burned again. Finally, by the treaty of 1763, it was all that was left to France of her Canadian empire. Long before Devil's Island was known to fame, this was a penal colony. Somebody alongside points, and says that that spot was Execution Rock.

For a matter of two centuries and more, the fishermen of St. Malo and Brest have found rendezvous in the bay for their season's work. As we enter, a big steam trawler lies at anchor. But in the last half dozen years ships of another kind also have found refuge in this rocky haven. Rum ships, big and little, fast and slow, sail and power, go forth laden to the waterline with cargoes, good for gold.

Events of recent weeks have transformed the town. For several years the rum trade had brought a steady flow of riches. Then Canada prohibited the exporting of liquor across our border. Every eye in the trade turned to St. Pierre. And St. Pierre, already stirred by a new pulse of life, sprang into fevered activity. Everywhere the sound of winches, the rattle of chains, the stowing of cargoes. And what cargoes!

As the Farnorth eased to her berth, the town emerged in detail from its shroud of fog. The wind changed, sweeping over the barren hills, carrying the fog along with a hissing protest. A huddle of ramshackle buildings lined the hillside streets. And, strangely for a French town, most of them were wood. But distinctively French, the acute angle of their roofs linking them to Gothic castles, cathedrals.

There was much activity—getting lines ashore, taking gendarmes aboard. Then a descent over the side, onto the solid substance of St. Pierre, welcome enough after a week of sailing. Only a skull nailed to a tree and a skeleton's pointing arm were missing to make this Pirate's Cove. But the pirate who had nailed a skull here must have brought the tree with him. There are exactly four trees gracing the landscapes of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

If the rum trade has brought riches to some of the 4,000 inhabitants of St. Pierre, it also has brought ruin to old Captain Jacques, who used to supply the island's firewood. In days gone by Captain Jacques made regular voyages to Newfoundland for the free-burning spruce. But St. Pierre has a new kind of firewood—the whisky and champagne cases derived from its principal trade. A pyramid of them rises in every yard. No wonder Captain Jacques laments.

Rum and riches! The two blend in St. Pierre. Its merchants do a sizable trade with the fishermen, both from France and near-by points. St. Pierre is liberal in the matter of duties, and ship stores can be had here for less than elsewhere. Seafaring men come to the island from 1,000 miles along the coast. It is one of the few spots in the world where prices are low.

But these matters are details. St. Pierre in the fullness of its new-found life is the great citadel of rum. On the average, fifteen to twenty contraband ships lie in its bay, with departure of four or five daily. And St. Pierre is bending to the task of caring for its trade. A new breakwater will offer better shelter, new wharves are under way, dredges are deepening the channel. Instead of fourteen feet clearance it soon will have enough water to accommodate big steamships. Already these arrive, from Canada and Europe, but stop outside.

AN EXECUTIVE TRAINING PLAN for men who want complete

FINANCIAL INDEPENDENCE

in the next five years

FIVE years from today, this conversation will take place over thousands of luncheon tables:

"I wonder what's going to happen in business?" one man will say. "The next few years are going to be hard."

His companion will laugh. "That's just what they said back in 1930," he will reply. "People were apprehensive after the crash, yet since then more business has been done, bigger fortunes made, than ever before. They've certainly been good years for me."

This conversation is imaginary now, but be assured of this—it will come true. These two men represent the two groups into which business men are dividing themselves now. In 1935 the men in one group will say to themselves, "I have got what I wanted." The others will say, "I wish I had those years back."

Send for the new booklet announcing an entirely new Series of Business Courses

The new Executive Training Plan of the Institute was designed for those who want to make their mark in the next five years.

The plan is new—so new that the final sections are only just now coming off the presses.

It is authoritative, for it numbers among its contributors such business leaders as Will H. Hays, Joseph P. Day, Bruce Barton, Dr. Julius Klein, David Sarnoff, and scores of others.

It is complete—a comprehensive, common-sense plan for your personal financial progress. Said one of our subscribers only the other day, "I have been on the up-grade ever since I enrolled. My $240 a month has jumped to $700. And I blame the Institute for it!"

How the plan works

This training gives you the most valuable equipment that a business man can have—a knowledge of the fundamental principles of all departments of business.

It teaches you the up-to-date methods of successful men whose authority is proved by incomes of $50,000, $100,000 and more.

It gives you new and valuable ideas—ideas that speed sales, ideas that cut costs, ideas that will increase the net profits of your company.

It shows you how to focus all your efforts on a definite goal—financial independence for yourself and your family.

It shows you how to invest your money profitably after you have made it.

are twenty-four today, bursting with cheer. In May of last year Canada shipped 16,114 gallons of spirits to St. Pierre and in May, 1930, the trade was 98,492 gallons. What it will be in a few months cannot even be guessed. Other thousands—hundreds of thousands—of gallons are coming from England, France, the world around. There are perhaps 1,000,000 cases of wine and liquor in St. Pierre's warehouses.

Where does the liquor go? Or, more pertinently, how does it get to market? The answer involves a vast organization, unlike anything known to the history of contraband trade. This organization is efficient and daring. It has at command every agency of trade, the aid of the sea, of the law. There always will be a chance, of course, for the man with a fifty-foot schooner to do a bit of rum-running. But, omitting him, rum-running is an enterprise of the first magnitude.

It begins somewhere with a regularly organized corporation, usually a Canadian or an English company. Such company has adequate banking connections and is able to finance its enterprises to no small extent by means of bank loans upon the collateral in warehouses. Two Canadian banks handle large sums of the money that pours through St. Pierre. The distributing companies may be known by the names above their doors.

BUT it would be difficult to prove that any one of these companies was deliberately engaged in outwitting the laws of a neighboring and friendly nation. Certainly a large number of their shipments are made to fictional consignees. That is no affair of the French Government, which approves the manifests. Once a cargo is out of port it can be landed anywhere the skipper may find opportunity. His action will be at variance with international usage, which requires that a ship's papers shall show completion of her voyage.

Undoubtedly there are considerable sums of American money invested in rum ships and distributing companies. But far the larger number of both operate under the British flag. The French have almost no part in smuggling operations. Their interest is in the sale of French products to willing buyers—an operation in every way legitimate. And the number of American ships engaged is negligible.

Attention, then, turns to the actual enterprise of rum-running, an enterprise to challenge the boldest spirit. When the skippers of the rum boats come ashore to gather in the Café du Nord or the Café de France, let us say, there is many a tale to be told. And such men to do the telling! Bold fellows these, who live close to danger and are not unfamiliar with the image of death. But not villains entirely. There is no greater degree of villainy among them than in any trade ashore. They are seafaring men of the race that vanishes. Rum-running is a game that may be a profitable game beyond any dream of fisherman or merchant skipper. They have elected to take a chance.

There are two ways to go rum-running. Either in a heavily laden and slow-moving schooner, or a speed boat lightly laden, swift of foot. A three-master will take 15,000 to 20,000 cases and remain at sea indefinitely; a speed boat will carry no more than 2,000 to 3,000 and must put into port or refuel at sea within two weeks, more probably ten days. The schooner will cost from $3,000 to $20,000 and the speed boat from $75,000 to $150,000. Such is the price of haste.

It is something to see a rum schooner going down the bay of St. Pierre, hull deep in the water, sails bellying to the breeze. Every whistle in port blows her good luck and a safe return. Many a schooner never comes back—the luck of the game. But it is not considered good form in St. Pierre to ask where a man went.

It also is something to see a speed boat start. Such speed boats as are used here represent a new pattern in marine architecture. From 75 to 150 feet long, they are broad of beam and deep of hull, some of them with 10 feet under their decks. But decks by courtesy, so far as foot space goes. These craft have important traits. No one knows their speed exactly, aside from their crews, but it crawls up to perhaps twenty knots an hour. Rather surprising, in view of their rumored speed, but fairly accurate. Motor craft capable of thirty knots do not carry tons of rum.

The speed boats are of dull navy gray, low-lying, ominous craft, carrying ten to fifteen men. Every speed boat and most of the schooners have powerful wireless. If report can be credited, the rum fleet engineers have developed silencers to throttle exhausts to a whisper. These boats go down the bay with a step like a kitten's.

It is not hard to conceive of the rum admirals, sitting ashore, commanding their fleets as might any war college. The radio is the great nerve of rum-running. Without it, organized operation would be impossible. There has been plenty of evidence to show contact between the rum-runners and stations ashore, by actual seizures of such stations. That others are in operation along the coast is a conclusion warranted by experience.

One-fourth of the rum moving out of St. Pierre finds its way into Canada. Surprising, but a fair estimate. Canadian liquor must yield high taxes to the government; St. Pierre liquor pays none. The low duties of the French possession make it possible to undersell government stores. And the remaining three-quarters of the contraband is designed for the United States. It could go nowhere else.

The rum admiral sitting ashore in tight quarters receives hourly reports of his fleet's progress. Deliveries begin anywhere from the Massachusetts coast southward. An average distance from St. Pierre would be between 600 and 1,000 miles. Every mile has been often traveled, the time factor is known. An admiral ashore, looking at his chart, divided into minute squares, can say to himself that the Fairy Queen with her 3,000 cases should be in Square 3 off Fire Island tomorrow night.

THERE seems to be no question that a string of wireless stations, secretly operated, keeps the rum fleet posted. Communication from ship to shore and back again apparently is as ready as by telephone. All of this communication must be carried on in code. Occasionally the Coast Guard discovers the key of some rum-running fleet. There are interesting developments. Or the rum-runners may have the good fortune to learn the Coast Guard key, followed by equal results.

Then the hide and seek grows intensive. St. Pierre boasts—truly or otherwise—of the cargoes landed when one rum-running fleet sent the Coast Guard chasing phantom craft. Doubtless the Coast Guard could match that story by another. The two services have mutual respect for one another. There are ethics to be observed and each is punctual of the tenets.

Assuming that a speed boat has arrived somewhere off New York, and the coast is reasonably clear, she will stand into shore as close as she dares. That may be anywhere outside the twelve-mile limit, or even within it. American seizures have been made within and without, and some technicality usually justifies the seizure. The main point, from the rum-runner's view, is not to be seized.

In that endeavor he displays a skill and cunning of the sea worthy to be chronicled. Let any man ashore fancy the dark night, the cold wind, the flying spray, when the small boats come off. It is then the smuggler stands into shore, or stands far out, as wisdom dictates. Then the hurried arrival of the shore boats, the swift loading and quick retreat—to the concert of beating hearts and anxious watch.

Having unloaded, the speed boats, or the schooners either, return direct to St. Pierre or continue to the Bahamas. Several organizations route their craft through to the British possessions and back again with another cargo for New York. Or the speed boats put to sea—100 to 200 miles—and refuel and reload from schooners waiting there. Thus a schooner with 20,000 cases may supply half a dozen speed boats carrying 2,000 or 3,000 cases each, in turn unloaded by boats carrying up to 1,000. Meanwhile, another schooner arrives and trade goes on.

Judging by every visible sign, this trade is one of millions and growing daily. No effort to stem the tide has diminished it. Each time a tourniquet is applied, the flood breaks forth elsewhere. At the moment the breach is St. Pierre. Then—it may be asked—what are the profits of rum-running?

Standard brands of rye and Scotch whisky sell in the St. Pierre market for $6 to $8 a case. Champagne is $10 to $12.

If we should take $8 as a price for a case of whisky in the island citadel, it will be interesting to see how the cost rises. Usually the whisky distributers are not rum-runners. Not uniformly, but ordinarily, they sell their stocks to contraband traders. These men may or may not operate their own boats. In the first case they run up their investments, and in the second they pay higher charges. The latter being the rule, $8 rum in St. Pierre becomes $10 or $11 rum off New York. Add $2 to $3 a case landing charges and $5 a case for protection, if the rum-runners may be believed. With a little breakage, that means $20 landed.

THEN there are carters' charges, warehouse charges and miscellaneous protection charges that add another $10 per case. This price puts the contraband in the warehouse. When it is removed, yet another cycle of charges means at least $10 additional. The distributer will expect $20 a case profit, or $60 as the typical price paid by the final distributer. At $8 a bottle, the average in New York, the purchaser pays $96 for the case that cost $8.

Between those figures lies a long trail of hardship, daring and outlawry. Rum-running is distinctly big business. Hand in hand with the buying, shipping and landing organization goes another organization prepared to meet emergencies, to pay hush money where most needed, to reclaim seized property wherever possible. The legal branch is able and far-reaching. No rum-runner ever remains without bail for many hours—unless he be a lone hand.

Such are a few scenes in the drama played upon—and distant from—the quay of St. Pierre—that ancient quay trodden by discoverers, by conquerors and conquered, by felons and seafaring men of the centuries. The modern freebooters hold the stage. Every day the argosy sails away or comes to port. Warehouses are filled and unfilled, wealth pours through the banks, a thousand wheels are turned, for the golden age has come.

A CHURCH OF THE SLEEPLESS CITY

Ascension, in Lower Fifth Avenue, Will Keep Its Doors Permanently Open

NEW YORK, "the city that never sleeps," has its first all-night church. No matter how late the hour at which a passer-by may turn from labor or pleasure, the old Church of the Ascension, at Fifth Avenue and Tenth Street, awaits his coming. Its doors have been opened a last time, "to remain so day and night as long as this brown edifice stands," as the Rev. Donald B. Aldrich proclaimed in the dedication service.

The church is an outpost of the past in the midst of the busy present. Many-storied apartments stand on every side. Erected when the avenue was young, the church once dominated the neighborhood of three-floor-and-basement houses. Now most of them are gone and it is engulfed in the new. Yet the visitor who crosses its threshold at 1 A. M. still may step from the present into the past.

On a recent week-day morning four men and two women had found their way here in the first hour of the new day. They sat apart. Overhead the light of the chandeliers cast a dimmed radiance upon the pews, making the nave seem vast.

Behind and between the Gothic columns, at the sides, masses of shadows appeared to move. An electric arc light on the corner shone strangely through the stained windows in a vivid play of blue and gold. Upon the far wall, at the end of the nave, showed La Farge's painting of the Ascension. In the mellow radiance of the chandeliers it looked mystical.

The visitor who comes in casually from the hurrying world of the Avenue has a momentary feeling of intrusion. More than likely he will fumble for the latch of the first convenient pew and subside on its comfortable red cushions. The stillness is enveloping. The sounds of motor horns and grinding gears hardly penetrate the sturdy walls.

What sort of men and women go to church in the long, quiet hours of the night? The nearest of the four men on this night plainly belonged to one of the professions. It was easy to think of him as a physician homeward bound from some late call. The inquiring eye looked for his bag of instruments. There was none. But he plainly had stepped into the old church for a moment of repose. He rested easily in the pew, undisturbed, a contemplative figure.

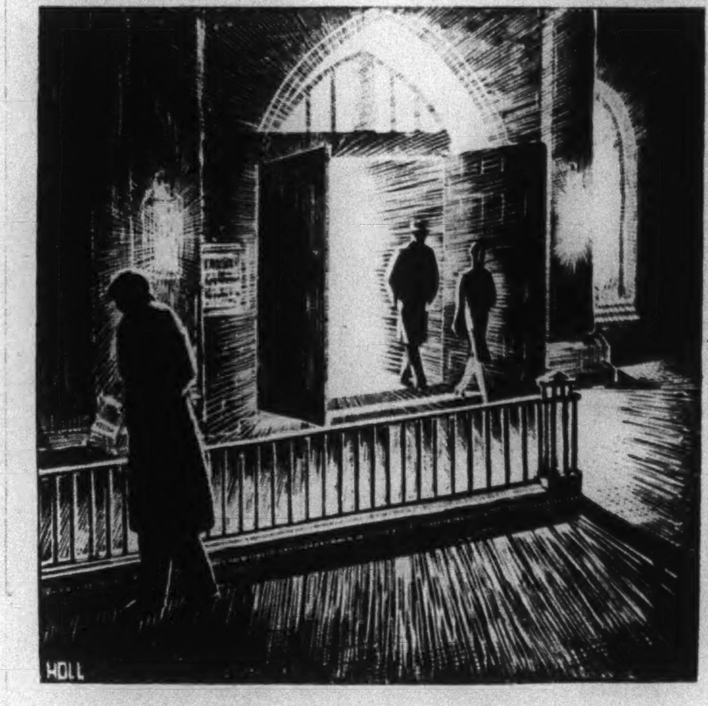
A LITTLE way down the aisle a woman sat severely in the corner of the pew, her eyes fixed on the Ascension. She was intent, her figure rigid. A man near the pulpit rose and went out, his footsteps distinct in the quiet church. His serious face, middle-aged and resolute, was etched sharply during the moment of his passing. Then the outer door was closed, a little noisily, and the sound magnified in the depths of the church.

Visitors entered before the sound had died, visitors who might be suspected of sightseeing. There were three young women and two men, and their entrance was disturbing. But the stillness of the interior subdued them. Their whispers dwindled to wordless quiet. The great calm of the church and the hour changed their mood until they sat motionless.

Between 1 o'clock and 3:30 A. M. the Church of the Ascension had fifteen visitors besides the sightseers. Four of them were women. Judging from appearances it would have been hard to decide that any definite kind of New Yorker goes to church between midnight and dawn. The visitors were of all kinds, including a girl of perhaps 18. She entered at two minutes past 2, alone.

She was probably returning from work. In the all-night city of New York numbers of women work at late hours, though State laws forbid factory employment at night. There are uncounted degrees of labor aside from factory tasks. The women sitting at telegraph keys and telephone boards would make up a numerous night-time army. Another army of scrub women scours and polishes the city's offices and halls of the city's skyscrapers. As for women cashiers, clerks, restaurant workers and holders of miscellaneous jobs—they number a host.

Some members of this host may be found in the city's subway trains, in its elevated and surface cars, or walking homeward in its myriad streets, at any hour from midnight onward. In no other city of the world may such numbers of women be seen in public at late hours of the night without escort or embarrassment. If this is a woman's world, New York surely may be called a woman's city. Any man who works at night has ceased to think it strange that his neighbor in the subway should be a woman, a night worker, too, engrossed in her morning paper.



At the Door of the All-Night Church.

New York is becoming more and more a twenty-four-hour city. It has not been unusual for various churches to hold services at late hours on special occasions. But the Church of the Ascension is said to be the first religious institution of the country to open its doors permanently.

It was no more than a half dozen years ago that the all-night bank appeared. The term is elastic, because most "all-night banks" close between 3 and 4 A. M., though in rush seasons they really do operate twenty-four hours daily. Such banks were demanded by midnight theatre performances.

Broadway, in the Times Square section alone, commonly has ten or a dozen places of amusement with performances running well toward the dawn. Since the all-night gunman is abroad as well as peaceable folk, the nocturnal banks meet a distinct need. Up or down brightly lighted Broadway goes a theatre usher in his bright uniform, bound for the all-night bank, followed by guards. Often the night-hour deposits are heavier than those of the day. The all-night banks are well guarded.

The all-night restaurant is an institution long established. Here the city may be observed close-up in its nightly parade. If one would see the institution at its best let him avoid the glitter of Broadway in favor of the first lunch cart, permanently parked in a side street. The modern de luxe railroad diner lunch cart is the heir of that rickety vehicle drawn by a bony horse, which formerly appeared nightly in the city's squares.

BY night New York is a changed city, as different from the New York of daylight as two worlds may be. This nocturnal city never wakes until the lights of Broadway rouse it into activity. Then its denizens and its workers rub sleepy eyes to begin their day's occupations by asking, "What is the news this evening?" as other men say "this morning." One labor official estimated that the night shift in New York's industries will approach 250,000 men and women. The number who work all night is perhaps 100,000. The workers make up the forces that clear the harbor shipping, that operate the city's transportation lines, its power plants, printing establishments and dozens of industries requiring a night shift.

Some undefined quality marks the night worker from his brother of the daylight. He is likely to be a romanticist. Let any man work a year or two at night and he will, it has been said, forever regret a day job, should he change his shift. To the habitué of the night, day is garish. It has few illusions. A night worker sees the world in its prettiest frock, wearing its spangles and gems. Every light becomes a diamond, every shadow may conceal romance.

Broadway after dark has its sinister touch, no less than its romance. As the hours grow long and the clock begins its new day's vigil, actors appear on the Broadway pavement that one never sees by day. After midnight any corner in the Forties becomes a gathering place for racing followers. Absorbed groups study the racing papers, fresh from the presses. Past performances and tomorrow's odds are the subject of eager debate. Prices are marked and bets swiftly made.

Up and down the street, Broadway's nightly panorama unfolds. Its advertising, like its workers, is of the all-night degree. Venerable sandwich men, bearing their boards upon their shoulders, walk the street to dawn. And Broadway's illumination at 3 A. M. is only a shade less brilliant than it was five hours before.

The lights twinkle before the all-night chop suey parlors, with their perennial dragons chasing themselves around a signboard. Others may take to new fashions in signboards if they will, but a chop suey parlor without its dragon would be unthinkable.

There is still another sort of establishment, sometimes without any kind of exterior light or signboard, but none the less well known. It goes by the name of speakeasy and flourishes everywhere. Upstairs and down, on the surface and below, of the de luxe quality or the humblest, it can be found conveniently at hand. And the all-night speakeasy is typically New York, too. It may be a place where tired men gather for one last nip before starting for distant homes, or another degree of speakeasy where the racing denizens, the men in peaked caps, gather. Or it may be a place of soft lights, evening clothes and fabulous prices. The speakeasy, in a word, is unmistakably a part of New York in its all-night mood.

'WHERE MAN DIGS FOR HISTORY

museum collections, and second to secure new information respecting their significance in time and culture. A little reflection will show that Americans, Englishmen, French and Germans dominate and that their expeditions usually take them into foreign countries. It is not strange then that archaeologists become involved in diplomatic relations. Few nations are willing to permit antiquities to leave their land. In the case of Mexico and the Latin-American countries, most of the population claims descent from stocks like the Aztec, Maya and Inca, who reared the temples and cities now in ruins. Though they have acquired much from Spain, a part of their background still vibrates sympathetically with the spirit of the ruined temples. Hence, they look upon them as a part of their birthright. So it is that each of these nations maintains laws guarding these antiquities and preventing their leaving the country.

The same is true in the Old World. There was a day when the archaeologist roamed the world at will and carried off whatever came to hand, but times have changed. Now permits must be secured from the governments concerned, often a matter of prolonged negotiation, and only a part, if any, of the collections made can be taken from the country. In the United States there are laws prohibiting the taking of archaeological objects from lands owned by the Federal Government and consequently all work done upon such lands must be by permit. In the United States the private owner of land is free to do what he will with such antiquities as his property may contain, but in most Latin-American and many Old World countries all archaeological remains are the property of the State and cannot be legally removed except by government agents. All of which makes clear the high regard all peoples have for antiquities and the relative importance and dignity of archaeology as a profession.

Thus far we have recognized but one advantage to be expected from all this expenditure of effort and money. That is to increase our knowledge of the past or to extend history backward. However, the contributions of archaeology to art are of real significance. Some of the priceless examples of ancient classical art come from archaeological expeditions. Even pottery, textiles, &c., from the pagan Aztec, Maya and Inca civilizations are coming to be valued as examples of art. This is why some of our largest art museums support archaeological expeditions and why artists not infrequently find inspiration in museums exhibiting American antiquities. Hence, the patron who supports an archaeological expedition is not merely aiding a scientific inquiry but contributing to the advancement of art and the humanities.

It is worth much to the nation to have a newspaper like The New York Times. It is worth much as an example to the nation's journalism—and especially to the nation's journalism students—to have that type of newspaper so obviously successful.

THE ECONOMIC WORLD AT A CROSSROADS

Sir Philip Gibbs Sees a Crisis in the Relation Between Consumption and Our Efficient Machine Production

By SIR PHILIP GIBBS

THE economic problems resulting from a World War are now for the most part out of date. That is to say, most countries have readjusted their industrial life as best they can to the new conditions created by that enormous upheaval and its trail of ruin, and they are now confronted by a new set of problems for which the war is not primarily responsible. Anyhow, they will not be solved by a process of gradual recovery from that conflict, or by the mere passage of time. They raise enormous questions of immediate and future importance not limited to one nation or group of nations, but of universal influence. In the opinion of many expert minds, the world is rapidly approaching a new economic crisis of the first magnitude.

It seems that the difficulties and distresses of individual nations are due not so much to their own internal affairs as to general causes of world-wide application. One symptom of distress is the spread of unemployment, not in the most backward nations, but in the most highly organized and the most intensely industrial countries. Great Britain has now 1,800,000 unemployed people, Germany has more than 2,000,000. The figures of unemployment in the United States have never been accurately stated, but most estimates I have seen recently place them at more than 5,000,000. There is a slackening in the exports of manufactured goods from most of the countries whose main wealth, like that of Britain, depends largely upon this export trade or whose standard of life and enjoyment of luxury, like that of the United States, depends to some extent upon the margin of profit derived from overseas trade.

At the present time British industry is seriously depressed in many branches (though vigorous in others), despite the recovery of Britain's position as a financial centre by financing world trade upon short-term credit. It is not only high taxation putting great and almost intolerable burdens upon British industrialists which is the cause of this depression. There is also the loss of markets. F. E. Tattersall, the cotton expert, recently stated that "the amount of spinning and weaving machinery now running in Lancashire, is smaller than at any time since the American Civil War, except for periods of strikes and lockouts." Germany, intensifying her industrial output on a wage scale 20 per cent lower than that of Britain, is capturing much trade that used to go to British factories, but has those 2,000,000 unemployed and is at the present time going through a severe financial crisis causing great anxiety to the German Government, which is faced by the necessity of new and drastic taxation upon a nation already overburdened in that way. In Argentina there is a period of trade depression and financial uneasiness. Canada has great reserves of grain for which there is no market. American agriculture, subsidized to the extent of $500,000,000, is not believed prosperous, or upon healthy foundations of world marketing. There is something wrong in the relation between world production and world consumption.

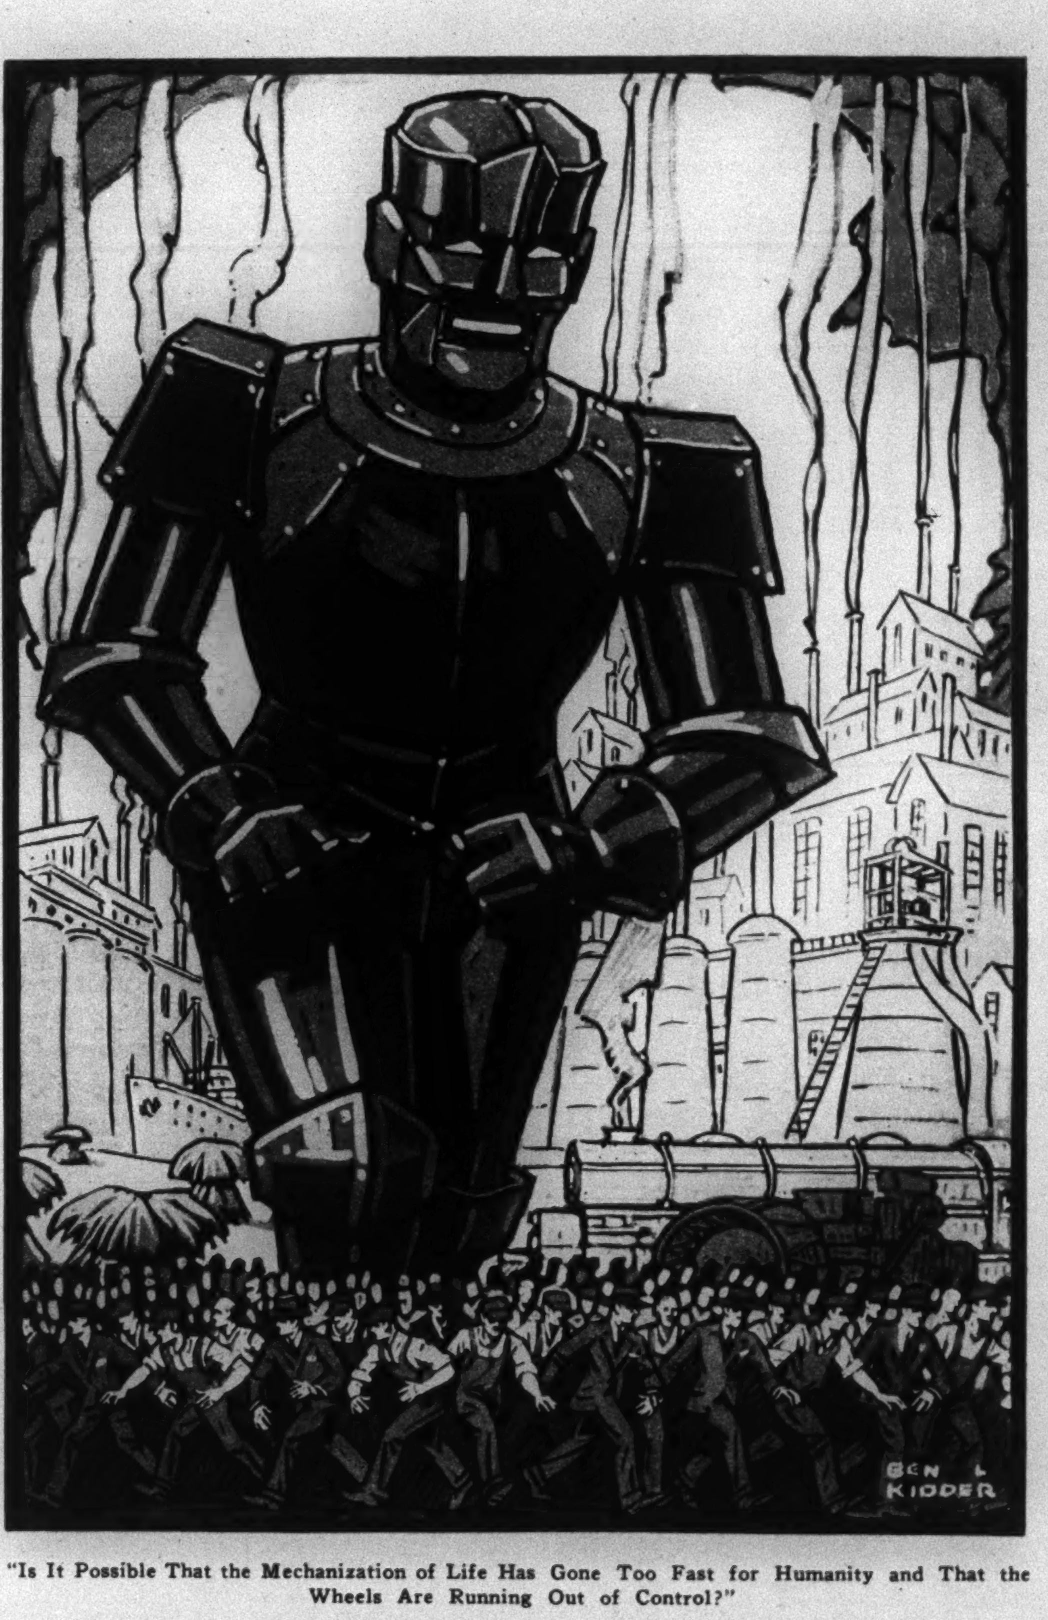
THAT is the danger spot of this coming crisis. It is the new problem which faces world industry. Nations speeding up their industrial efficiency, mechanizing their old-fashioned methods of production, feverishly competing in the world's market places, find that their goods cannot find sufficient purchasers.



"Is It Possible That the Mechanization of Life Has Gone Too Fast for Humanity and That the Wheels Are Running Out of Control?"

Harold Cox, the well known English economist, raised this new problem in clear terms. "The ultimate truth that all of us have to face," he writes, "is that the problem of unemployment is not a national but a world problem, and that, therefore, it is hopeless to attempt to solve it by any purely political devices, whether they take the form of tariffs to shut out foreign goods or of State expenditure to pay for artificial aids."

Lord Stonehaven, Governor General of Australia, in a recent address, has gone deeper into the underlying cause. "The twentieth century," he says, "has brought along a social problem similar to that of the industrial revolution. The human mind has developed mastery over engineering and mechanics to the extent that the needs of mankind are now being produced in an excess of consumption. This is not a passing phase of unemployment but a definite new problem that each one of us must face."

Even that does not go quite deep enough. The statement is not absolutely true unless one adds that the needs of mankind are being produced in an excess of the purchasing power of its peoples. With that important modification it is incontestable, I think, that mechanical efficiency has increased at too rapid a pace for the present conditions of world trade. Even in Europe, still far behind the mechanical organization of the United States, there has been a great increase in machine power adapted to manufactured goods since the war. Many new nations formerly agricultural have entered the industrial field of competition. Italy is now a manufacturing nation. The Baltic States are setting up factories. Germany has reorganized and intensified her industrial output.

They are all looking to export trade to obtain their margin of profit and at the same time they are surrounding themselves by high tariff walls to prevent the other fellow from competing in their home market. It is not only in the production of manufactured goods that there is an excess of supply over demand. Raw material is being produced by mechanical means beyond the consuming power of the world in its present economic state. The French restored their mines, after destruction by shell fire, with the latest equipment, thereby reducing British export of coal to France. Germany is raising more coal than she can sell profitably. England and Wales are in the same plight. The world's supply of grain from Canada and Argentina and the United States cannot be absorbed, although there are starving people here and there, as in Russia and China. The last fifty years has seen the development of machinery applied to agriculture and the gradually decreasing need of laborers to work the fields, thus creating unemployment in rural areas and a consequent drift to the cities which can no longer absorb them profitably.

That has not happened in Europe to anything like the same degree as in Canada, the United States or Argentina, and in such countries as France the small peasant farmers still do most of their work by hand labor on a low social scale and with immensely long hours of work. Nevertheless, France, which protects her agriculture from foreign supplies, is able to absorb her young manhood in the fields—thus eliminating unemployment—whereas Britain by opening her gates to Canadian and American produce, has not that advantage and is becoming less and less able to maintain a rural population. That would not matter and did not matter very much, apart from keeping up the good old stock of country-bred folk, so long as industry could absorb this drift into the cities greedy for human hands to work the machines, but as we have seen, industry is now producing beyond the market needs, and the cities are crowded with workless people living on unemployed relief, otherwise called "the dole."

For the moment, and for the immediate future, the industrial era is threatened by a severe crisis. The pace of industry is likely to be checked by the necessity of limiting output, and unemployment is likely to increase by stringent methods to reduce overhead charges and other costs, such as "rationalization" in Europe, the combination of small concerns, and the displacement of labor by mechanical power. It will also be checked, and is at present checked, by the prevailing belief that only by the protection of the home market can the dwindling of exports be compensated. Most of the European States, with the exception of Great Britain, are heavily protected by tariff walls tending to get higher as competition from neighboring countries becomes more fierce and active in the effort to invade them with cheap goods, similar to those they are themselves producing.

Now Great Britain is in the throes of a political crisis, raising the old battle cries between free trade and protection. To my mind, it is almost certain that there will be some form of imperial preference between Great Britain and her dominions, by which Canada, for instance, will allow the entry of many branches of manufactured goods from Britain in return for a bigger market for her grain. In that case, Argentina will be heavily hit, and what Britain gains from Canada she may lose in trade with South America.

THE economic situation in Europe is affected by the new American tariff, and that factor has psychological as well as material reactions. Countries like France, Germany and Italy, to name only a few who are debtor nations to the United States, are extremely disturbed by this new tariff, which to the very last they hoped would be revoked by Mr. Hoover's veto. It is too soon, yet, to say how much European trade will be hurt by this new tariff scale, but the European mind is already arguing that the only possible means of paying the interest on American loans—the world owes America $16,000,000,000, according to André Geraud—otherwise known as "Pertinax"—is by the American purchase of European goods. That is now made enormously difficult by the tariff wall, and America, it is argued, cannot have it both ways. The United States may find that Europe cannot meet its obligations if its peoples are prevented from doing so by this blockade of manufactured goods. That is the argument, and it is giving strength to the movement in favor of Briand's scheme of a United States of Europe, which is only in its theoretical stage.

So far there is no tendency at all to lower the tariff walls between European nations themselves. The truth is that every nation is anxious to get the most out of its home market while extending its sales of goods abroad—a conflict of aims which is leading to a reductio ad absurdam. Perhaps at the moment, and for some time to come, the United States alone has the advantage of being self-contained, owing to an enormous homogeneous population and vast internal resources; but I honestly believe that the American people will have to reduce their standard of life below the recent scale of luxury if this self-contained policy within a formidably high tariff leads—as it must inevitably—to a dwindling of exports.

SUMMER'S INFORMAL NOTE IN DECORATIONS

for tennis dresses and white flannel trousers. To overcome the anachronism, the wide embrasure of the window is put to use. A simple oval table, of early Italian make, with cane bottom chairs from Tuscany, provide a suitable setting for the unconventional breakfast and lunch hours.

In the majority of country houses having but one dining room an effort to establish a feeling of lightness is evident. Frequently, it is achieved through the use of "garden papers," Chinese, English, French. At other times it is obtained by murals. Of late years the hand-blocked papers that adorned the walls of French chateaux, English country houses and early American homes have grown fragile and rare. It is not often that, when found, they fit the wall spaces of modern structures. Some are faithfully reproduced. Nevertheless, an ample field has been left open for the art of the mural decorator. Not only does the painter preserve the old pattern and its subtle hues; he adapts them to twentieth-century needs.

EXQUISITE among the old designs being perpetuated in the dining rooms that breathe the spirit of the open are those originated by the Chinese. In the modern mural the conventional pattern is adapted both in rhythm and color to the room. There is the white cherry tree, coral tipped, that glows with the iridescence of moonlight, the luxuriant Oriental rose on a surface of blue, or the feathery tree and lacy fern silhouetted against ivory white. Carpet, hangings and upholstery are carefully attuned to the refinement of color in the murals. In such rooms as these the furniture is, perforce, restrained. Heppelwhite, Sheraton and Chippendale are favorites.

The country house dining room adapts itself to its surroundings as a matter of course. The city dining room has greater latitude. It frequently happens that it, too, gets away from plaster and paneled walls and is enlivened by scenic murals. Joseph and June Platt have successfully painted scenes of old New York in a dining room in the city whose architectural past they have recorded. In the gay movement of the panorama that encircles the room of the old Treasury Building, rows of red brick high-gabled fronts, and sturdy masts of sailing vessels take their places. Full-foliaged trees and pointed spires serve as accents to the design, developed in soft browns, grays and greens. The room is covered with a carpet of gold chenille. Against the subdued tones of wall and floor the rich mahogany of the Sheraton furniture stands in bold relief.

Another amusing adventure in decoration in the heart of steel-ribbed New York is an Italian breakfast room, adjunct to an English house. Its owners, who spend much of the Summer in the heat-bound city, ordered a room that would recall the limpid waters and the purple hills of the Italian lakes. An Italian painter was summoned. On the canvas stretched around the walls he created deep vistas; blue waters, shadowy mountains and a cerulean sky. To strengthen the illusion a balustrade was carried around the room. At one end the continuity of the decoration is broken by a niche in which a small statue stands, bearing a double tier of marble basins on his head. From them water drops, singing an unceasing arpeggio as it trickles downward.

Many a city apartment relies for its Summer mood upon a sun room or terrace, both of which, as more Americans join the ranks of the sun-worshipers, are obtaining increasing recognition in architects' plans. They are making demands upon the ingenuity of designers. Each season brings forth new ideas, or adaptations of old ones. The sun room in the city home often takes the place of the informal dining room in the country. It has an air of out-of-doorness, and its exposure to sun and sky inspire in the decorator the desire to bring to it the spirit of the open. It is an achievement that must be obtained by artificial means.

This was the urge that brought iron trees into use. Fantastic as the trees drawn by Rackham's brush, they spread their branches against a wall, generously holding plant-filled pots in their metal grip. The trees designed by Ruth Collins are notable for their rhythmic beauty. The smooth flow of their conventionalized lines rivals the poetic movement of the models that called them forth. The number of pot holders with which they are supplied permits an abundant tangle of greenery to fall over their iron limbs. The trees are "trained" to fit any composition. They can be made to encircle doorways and to stand guard by windows.

Iron is increasing in popularity for both town and country use. The ornamental shapes into which it can be wrought lend themselves to the manufacture of charming furniture. In design it is crisp and clean cut. Miss Collins has used iron for tables of all sizes and descriptions. Long and narrow for dining; six-sided for lunch and tea; low and round for after-dinner coffee. The top is always of glass, crystal clear as a mountain brook, so that the massed color of plants and flowers that stand on a shelf, beneath it (the shelf is a part of the design of the table) radiates through its transparency. One of the advantages of the glass-top table, with its substrata of flowers and plants, is that it requires no linen, and that it offers interesting opportunities for evolving color effects through the balanced use of flowers, pottery and glassware. The Chippendale period furnishes a popular motif for iron tables and chairs. More unusual is a simplified flower design, which fills the back of the chair with a pattern, fragile as a spider's web.

Designers who have let their imaginations deal with the problem of the city dweller's home have summoned trellis work to their aid. It can be used in many ways. In one successful sun room a light network of lattice covers the entire wall space, fitting around windows and doors with the suppleness of a glove. The room is unusual because of the expanse of windows that form a wide bay across one end of it. The lattice is painted a mat green to match the color of the hangings. The room lacks the stamp of any particular period; upholstered chairs covered with modern printed linen make it a place for lounging and painted Italian chairs and table bring it a note of formality.

Italian and French landscape architects have long delighted in the introduction of false perspective by means of trellis work. Today it is finding a place in the sun parlor. One phase of its application is being demonstrated in the Belmaison at Wanamaker's. In each window of the exhibition hall, converted into a courtyard with tiled floor and plaster walls, is a lattice. Through the false perspective of its arches one looks down on what appears to be a long vista at the end of which is a familiar Venetian scene. Behind each lattice is a blind on which some well-known view of the Queen of the Adriatic is represented. Fountains splash in the artificial courtyard. Large jars of colored pottery give it a vivid glow. The cushions on malacca seats and chaise longues are covered with bourré, a hand-woven silk made in Aix-en-Provence. Low tables with tiled tops and iron bases, and stands on which large lacquer trays rest, suggest the tea hour.

LIFE'S GOLDEN RING AT CONEY

hand over a ticket. His manner plainly says that the show probably isn't much good. As the customer enters, both the barker and the ticket man turn to watch him go in—their air one of polite surprise, and a wonder as to how they did it.

WITHIN the show itself there is an atmosphere of dust. The actors in the drama of the '90s sit on their stools and wait patiently. When a small crowd has collected the one nearest the door gets to his feet and begins the speech about himself that precedes the selling of photographs. While the midget talks the sword swallower across the room smokes a cigarette, and the "world-famous magician" reads a newspaper. Next to him is the snake charmer, polishing her finger nails and carrying on a trivial conversation with the fat woman.

As each finishes his talk, he sits down again and waits for something else to happen. Sometimes he takes a short walk about the room or drinks coffee behind the stand. Outside the placid tones of the barker can be heard boasting of his presence, but he pays no attention. He has heard it all before; and while it used to cause him some pleasure, it no longer does even that.

Finally closing time arrives. All up and down the Midway, where a moment before have been noise and light, there is a sudden quiet. The barkers grab their hats and coats and walk hurriedly away. The proprietors of the stands move their goods back from temptation's path and put the boards over their counters. One by one the lights go out in the shops. Their owners give a last turn to the locks and go away.

The Ferris wheel stands dark, a shadowy circle in the sky. The roller coaster has rumbled to its final halt and it lies quietly beneath a canvas covering—as if seeking protection against the quiet. The slowly rocking "Old Mill" has stopped for the night at a strange angle, and the man of straw in its doorway contemplates the darkness reflectively. The bowling alleys are still, the arc of the pendulum in the shooting gallery grows slowly smaller.

There is a burst of laughter from the direction of the subway station. Then a train, brightly lighted, starts out. It gathers speed and is soon lost. There is quiet.

A CASHLESS BANK THAT DEALS IN MILLIONS

BASLE.

THERE is only one bank in Basle that does not look like a million dollars. It is the super-bank. Indeed, it is doubtful if there is anywhere a bank that looks less like a bank than does the Bank for International Settlements, the bank that started business in May with one client depositing a mere $100,000,000 with it.

There is no "Bank for International Settlements" stretching in big solid letters across its façade. There is no ostentatiously small bronze plaque at the door.. There is nothing at all to reveal its identity to the passer-by. There are no bars over the windows. There is no armored motor car parked in the vicinity. There is no plainclothes man in the hall to scrutinize those who enter.
